

HONORÉ DE BALZAC

HIS LIFE AND WRITINGS

BY MARY F. SANDARS

WITH PORTRAITS

LONDON
JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET
1904

PRINTED BY MAZELL, WATSON AND VINEY, LD., LONDON AND AYLESBURY

PREFACE

Books about Balzac would fill a fair-sized library. Criticisms on his novels abound, and his contemporaries have provided us with several amusing volumes dealing in a humorous spirit with his eccentricities, and conveying the impression that the author of "La Cousine Bette" and "Le Père Goriot" was nothing more than an amiable buffoon.

Nevertheless, by some strange anomaly, there exists no Life of him derived from original sources, incorporating the information available since the appearance of the volume called "Lettres à l'Étrangère." This book, which is the source of much of our present knowledge of Balzac, is a collection of letters written by him from 1833 to to 1844 to Madame Hanska, the Polish lady who afterwards became his wife. The letters are exact copies of the originals, having been made by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, to whom the autographs belong.

It seems curious that no one should yet have made use of this mine of biographical detail. In English we have a Memoir by Miss Wormeley, written at very small book, and the space in it devoted to Balzac as a man is further curtailed by several chapters devoted to criticism of his work. The introduction to the excellent translation of Balzac's novels undertaken by Mr. Saintsbury, contains a short account of his life, but this only fills a few pages and does not enter into much detail. Besides these, an admirable essay on Balzac has appeared in "Main Currents of Nineteenth-century Literature," by Dr. George Brandes; the scope of this, however, is mainly criticism of his merits as a writer, not description of his personality and doings.

OCT 12 '76

Even in the French language, there is no trustworthy or satisfactory Life of Balzac—a fact on which the numerous critical writers make many comments, though they apparently hesitate to throw themselves into the breach and to undertake one. Madame Surville's charming Memoir only professes to treat of Balzac's early life, and even within these limits she intentionally conceals as much as she reveals. M. Edmond Biré, in his interesting book, presents Balzac in different aspects, as Royalist, playwriter, admirer of Napoleon, and so on; but M. Biré gives no connected account of his life, while MM. Hanotaux and Vicaire deal solely with Balzac's two years as printer and publisher. The Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul is the one man who could give a detailed and minutely correct Life of Balzac, as he has proved by the stores of biographical knowledge contained in his works the "Roman d'Amour," "Autour de Honoré de Balzac," "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac, 'Les Paysans,'" and above all, "L'Histoire des Œuvres de Balzac," which has become a classic. The English or American reader would hardly be able to appreciate these fascinating books, however, unless he were first equipped with the knowledge of Balzac which would be provided by a concise Life.

In these circumstances, helped and encouraged by Dr. Emil Reich, whose extremely interesting lectures I had attended with much enjoyment, and who very kindly gave me lists of books, and assisted me with advice, I engaged in the task of writing this book. It is not intended to add to the mass of criticism of Balzac's novels, being merely an attempt to portray the man as he was, and to sketch correctly a career which has been said to be more thrilling than a large proportion of novels.

I must apologise for occasional blank spaces, for when Balzac is with Madame Hanska, and his letters to her cease, as a general rule all our information ceases also; and the intending biographer can only glean from scanty allusions in the letters written afterwards, what happened at Rome, Naples, Dresden, or any of the other towns, to which Balzac travelled in hot haste to meet his divinity.

The book has been compiled as far as possible from original sources; as the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul—whose collection of documents relating to Balzac, Gautier, and George Sand is unique, while his comprehensive knowledge of Balzac is the result of many years of study—has most kindly allowed me to avail myself of his library at Brussels. There, arranged methodically, according to some wonderful system which enables the Vicomte to find at once any document his visitor may ask for, are hundreds of Balzac's autograph writings, many of them unpublished and of great interest. There, too, are portraits and busts of the celebrated novelist, letters from his numerous admirers, and the proofs of nearly all his novels—those sheets covered with a network of writing, which were the despair of the printers. The collection is most remarkable, even when we remember the large sums of money, and the patience and ability, which have for many years been focussed on its formation. It will one day be deposited in the museum at Chantilly, near documents and autograph letters, the exact words of which have been the subject of discussion and dispute, so that I have been able myself to verify the fact that the copies made by M. de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul are taken exactly from the originals. He has warned me to be particularly careful about my authorities, as many of Balzac's letters—printed as though copied from autographs—are incorrectly dated, and have been much altered.

He has further added to his kindness by giving me several illustrations, and by having this book translated to him, in order to correct it carefully by the information to which he alone has access. I gladly take this opportunity of acknowledging how deeply I am indebted to him.

I cannot consider these words of introduction complete without again expressing my sense of what I owe to Dr. Reich, to whom the initial idea of this book is due, and without whose energetic impetus it would never have been written. He has found time, in the midst of a very busy life, to read it through, and to make many valuable suggestions, and I am most grateful for all he has done to help me.

I must finish by thanking Mr. Curtis Brown most heartily for the trouble he has taken on my behalf, for the useful hints he has given me, and for the patience with which he has elucidated the difficulties of an inexperienced writer.

MARY F. SANDARS.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I

PAGE

Balzac's claims to greatness—The difficulty in attempting a complete Life—His complex character—The intention of this book 1

CHAPTER II

Balzac's appearance, dress, and personality—His imaginary world and schemes for making money—His family, childhood, and school-days 16

CHAPTER III

Balzac's tutors and law studies—His youth, as pictured in the "Peau de Chagrin"—His father's intention of making him a lawyer—He begs to be allowed to become a writer—Is allowed his wish—Life in the Rue Lesdiguières, privations and starvation—He writes "Cromwell," a tragedy . . . 44

CHAPTER IV

Reading of "Cromwell"—Balzac is obliged to live at home—Unhappiness—Writes romantic novels—Friendship with Madame de Berny—Starts in Paris as publisher and afterwards as printer—Impending bankruptcy only prevented by help from his parents and Madame de Berny 70

CHAPTER V

Life in the Rue de Tournon—Privations and despair—Friendships—Auguste Borget—Madame Carraud—The Duchesse d'Abrantès—George Sand, etc.—Balzac writes "La Peau de Chagrin" and the "Physiologie du Mariage"—His right to be entitled "De Balzac" 90

CHAPTER VII

Crisis in Balzac's private life—"Contes Drôlatiques"—Madame Hanska's life before she met Balzac—Description of her appearance—"Louis Lambert"—Disinterested conduct on the part of Madame de Berny—Relations between Balzac and his mother—Balzac and the Marquise de Castries—His despair 134

CHAPTER VIII

Advertisement in the Quotidienne—Letters between Balzac and Madame Hanska—His growing attachment to her—Meeting at Neufchâtel—Return to Paris—Work—"Études de Mœurs au XIXième Siècle"—Le Médecin de Campagne"—"Eugénie Grandet"—Meets Madame Hanska at Vienna—"La Duchesse de Langeais"—Balzac's enormous power of work—"La Recherche de l'Absolu"—"Le Père Goriot"—Vienna—Monetary difficulties—Republishes romantic novels—Continual debt—Amusements 156

CHAPTER IX

Balzac's portrait as described by Gautier—His character—Belief in magnetism and somnambulism—His attempts to become deputy—His political and religious views 180

CHAPTER X

Balzac starts the Chronique de Paris—Balzac and Théophile Gautier—Lawsuit with the Revue de Paris—Failure of the Chronique—Strain and exhaustion—Balzac travels in Italy—Madame Marbouty—Return to Paris—Death of Madame de Berny—Balzac's grief and family anxieties—He is imprisoned for refusal to serve in Garde Nationale—Werdet's failure—Balzac's desperate pecuniary position and prodigies of work—Close of the disastrous year 1836 202

CHAPTER XI

PAGE

"Louise"—Drawing-room in Rue des Batailles—The "Cheval Rouge"—Balzac's second visit to Italy—Conversation with Genoese merchant—Buys Les Jardies at Sèvres—Travels to Sardinia to obtain silver from worked-out mines—Disappointment—Balzac goes on to Italy—Takes up his abode in Les Jardies—Life there—He hopes to write a successful play—"L'École des Ménages"—Balzac's half-starved condition—He defends Peytel 226

CHAPTER XII

"Vautrin"—La Revue Parisienne—Société des Gens de Lettres—Balzac leaves Les Jardies, and goes to the Rue Basse, Passy—Death of M. de Hanski—"Les Ressources de Quinola"—"La Comédie Humaine"—Balzac goes to St. Petersburg to meet Madame Hanska—Her reasons for deferring the marriage 249

CHAPTER XIII

Paméla Giraud—Balzac again attempts to become member of the Académie Française—Mlle. Henriette Borel's reception into a religious house—Comte Georges Mniszech—"Les Paysans" started in La Presse—Madame Hanska's unreasonableness hinders Balzac's work—He travels with her and her daughter, and they return with him to Passy—Comtesse Anna engaged to Comte Georges Mniszech—Balzac takes Madame Hanska and her daughter to Brussels—He meets Madame Hanska at Baden-Baden—Leaves Paris again, meets Wierzchownia party at Naples—Buys bric-à-brac for future home—Work neglected—Dispute with Émile de Girardin—Balzac's unhappiness and suspense—He goes to Rome—Comes back better in health and spirits—"La Cousine Bette" and "Le Cousin Pons"—Balzac goes to Wiesbaden—Marriage of Comtesse Anna and Comte Georges Mniszech—Balzac and Madame Hanska secretly engaged—Parisian gossip . . 273

CHAPTER XIV

Balzac buys a house in the Rue Fortunée—Madame Hanska's visit to Paris—Balzac burns her letters—Final breach with Émile de Girardin—Balzac's projects for writing for the theatre—He goes to Wierzchownia—Plan for transporting oaks from Russia to France—Balzac returns to Paris at the eve of the Revolution of 1848—Views on politics—Stands for last time as deputy 298

CHAPTER XV

Description of interior of house in the Rue Fortunée—" Marâtre"—Projected plays—"Le Faiseur"—Balzac see admission for the last time to the Académie Française—returns to Wierzchownia—Failing health—Letters to family—Family relations are strained . . . .

CHAPTER XVI

Peace renewed between Balzac and his family—He thinks old friends—Madame Hanska's continued vacillations—I Knothe's treatment—Madame Hanska's relations w Balzac, and her ignorance about his illness—Visit Kiev—Balzac's marriage—His letters to his mother, sist and to Madame Carraud—Delay in starting for France Terrible journey—Madame Honoré de Balzac's pearl nec lace and strange letter—Balzac's married life—Arrival the newly-married couple in Paris . . . .

CHAPTER XVII

Balzac's ill-health—Théophile Gautier and Victor Hugo—Balza grief about the unfinished "Comédie Humaine"—His int view with the doctor—Victor Hugo's account of his deat bed—Balzac's death and funeral—Life afterwards in t Rue Fortunée—Reckless extravagance—House rifled Madame de Balzac's death—Fate of Balzac's MSS.—H merits as a writer . . . . . .

ILLUSTRATIONS

BALZAC. From a Sepia Drawing in the Museum at Tours Frontispiece

The Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul tells us in an article in the Revue de Fribourg, in January and February, 1903, that this portrait was given to Tours by the Baron Larrey, who obtained it from a friend of Balzac, Madame de Valette. In Tours it is considered to be the work of Louis Boulanger, but the Vicomte attributes it to Devéria. Balzac as here represented is from thirty to thirty-five years of age.

BALZAC'S HANDWRITING . . . . . To face p. 128

Facsimile of the last page of an article entitled: "Du Gouvernement Moderne," written by Balzac at Aix in 1832. This specimen was kindly given to the Author by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, who possesses the original.

RODIN'S STATUE OF BALZAC. Exhibited in Paris at l'Exposition des Beaux-Arts in 1898 . . To face p. 184

This is only modelled, and has never been sculptured.

BALZAC. From Daguerreotype taken in 1842 and now in the possession of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul . . . . . To face p. 264

This is said by the Vicomte to be the only portrait he knows which is a likeness with no attempt at arrangement or interpretation. Supposed to have been given only to Balzac's sister and to a few friends.

HONORÉ DE BALZAC

CHAPTER I

Balzac's claims to greatness—The difficulty in attempting a complete Life—His complex character—The intention of this book.

At a time when the so-called Realistic School is in the ascendant among novelists, it seems strange that little authentic information should have been published in the English language about the great French writer, Honoré de Balzac. Almost alone among his contemporaries, he dared to claim the interest of the world for ordinary men and women solely on the ground of a common humanity. Thus he was the first to embody in literature the principle of Burns that "a man's a man for a' that"; and though this fact has now become a truism, it was a discovery, and an important discovery, when Balzac wrote. He showed that, because we are ourselves ordinary men and women, it is really human interest, and not sensational circumstance which appeals to us, and that material for enthralling drama can be found in the life of the most commonplace person—of a middle-aged shopkeeper threatened with bankruptcy, or of an elderly musician with a weakness for good novel.

His own life is full of interest. He was n recluse or a bookworm; his work was to st men, and he lived among men, he fought str ously, he enjoyed lustily, he suffered keenly, he died prematurely, worn out by the force o own emotions, and by the prodigies of labou which he was impelled by the restless prompt of his active brain, and by his ever-pressing for money. Some of his letters to Mad Hanska have been published during the last years; and where can we read a more pathetic story than the record of his seventeen years' ing for her, and of the tragic ending to his l deferred happiness? Or where in modern t can more exciting and often comical tales of ad ture be found than the accounts of his wild always unsuccessful attempts to become a mil aire? His friends comprised most of the celeb French writers of the day; and though not a of society, he was acquainted with many var of people, while his own personality was pow vivid, and eccentric.

Thus he appears at first sight to be a fascin subject for biography; but if we examine a more closely, we shall realise the web of diffic

n which the writer of a complete and exhaustive Life of Balzac would involve himself, and shall understand why the task has never been attempted. The great author's money affairs alone are so complicated that it is doubtful whether he ever mastered them himself, and it is certainly impossible for any one else to understand them; while he managed to shroud his private life, especially his relations to women, in almost complete mystery. For some years after his death the monkish habit in which he attired himself was considered symbolic of his mental attitude; and even now, though the veil is partially lifted, and we realise the great part women played in his life, there remain many points which are not yet cleared up.

Consequently any one who attempts even in the most unambitious way to give a complete account of the great writer's life, is confronted with many blank spaces. It is true that the absolutely mysterious disappearances of which his contemporaries speak curiously are now partially accounted for, as we know that they were usually connected with Madame Hanska, and that Balzac's sense of honour would not allow him to breathe her name, except to his most intimate friends, and under the pledge of the strictest secrecy. His letters to her have allowed a flood of light to pour upon his hitherto veiled personality; but they are almost our only reliable source of information. Therefore, when they cease, because Balzac is with his lady-

great part of his time during the last f
of his life. We know that he travelled, r of expense and exhaustion, as quickly as and by the very shortest route, to meet Hanska; but this once accomplished, gather little more, and we long for a di confidential correspondent. In the first of his meeting at Neufchâtel, he did inde his heart to his sister, Madame Surville; habitual discretion, and his care for the re
of the woman he loved, soon imposed sile him, and he ceased to comment on t drama of his life.

The great versatility of his mind, power he possessed of throwing himself utmost keenness into many absolutely and incongruous enterprises at the sa add further to the difficulty of understand An extraordinary number of subjects h place in his capacious brain, and the e which he dismissed one and took up with equal zest the moment after, ca doings to seem unnatural to us of mind. Léon Gozlan gives a curious of this on the occasion of the first re
the "Ressources de Quinola."

Balzac had recited his play in the gr

the Odéon to the assembled actors and actresses, d before a most critical audience had gone ough the terrible strain of trying to improvise e fifth act, which was not yet written. He d Gozlan went straight from the hot atmoere of the theatre to refresh themselves in e cool air of the Luxembourg Gardens. Here e should expect one of two things to happen.
ther Balzac would be depressed with the ill-ccess of his fifth act, at which, according to ozlan, he had acquitted himself so badly that adame Dorval, the principal actress, refused to ke a rôle in the play; or, on the other hand, s sanguine temperament would cause him to erlook the drawbacks, and to think only of the thusiasm with which the first four acts had been ceived. Neither of these two things took place.
lzac "n'y pensait déjà plus." He talked with e greatest eagerness of the embellishments he d proposed to M. Decazes for his palace, and pecially of a grand spiral staircase, which was to ad from the centre of the Luxembourg Gardens the Catacombs, so that these might be shown visitors, and become a source of profit to Paris.
ut of his play he said nothing.

The reader of "Lettres à l'Étrangère," which are ritten to the woman with whom Balzac was assionately in love, and whom he afterwards arried, may, perhaps, at first sight congratulate imself on at last understanding in some degree he great author's character and mode of life. If he dives beneath the surface, however, he will fi that these beautiful and touching letters give b an incomplete picture; and that, while writi them, Balzac was throwing much energy ir schemes, which he either does not mention to correspondent, or touches on in the most curs fashion. Therefore the perspective of his life difficult to arrange, and ordinary rules for gaug character are at fault. We find it impossible follow the principle, that because Balzac posses one characteristic, he could not also show diametrically opposite quality—that, for instan because tenderness, delicacy of feeling, and a h sense of reverence and of honour were undoubte integral parts of his personality, the stories t by his contemporaries of his occasional coarser must necessarily be false.

His own words, written to the Duche d'Abrantès in 1828, have no doubt a great elem of truth in them: "I have the most singu character I know. I study myself as I might st another person, and I possess, shut up in my foot eight inches, all the incoherences, all contrasts possible; and those who think me v extravagant, obstinate, high-minded, without c nection in my ideas,—a fop, negligent, idle, with application, without reflection, without any c stancy; a chatterbox, without tact, badly brou up, impolite, whimsical, unequal in temper,— quite as right as those who perhaps say that I economical, modest, courageous, stingy, energe

vorker, constant, silent, full of delicacy, polite, ays gay. Those who consider that I am a coward l not be more wrong than those who say that I am remely brave ; in short, learned or ignorant, full talent or absurd, nothing astonishes me more n myself. I end by believing that I am only an trument played on by circumstances. Does this leidoscope exist, because, in the soul of those who im to paint all the affections of the human heart, ance throws all these affections themselves, so at they may be able, by the force of their imagina-n, to feel what they paint? And is observation ort of memory suited to aid this lively imagina-n? I begin to think so."*

Certainly Balzac's character proves to the hilt e truth of the rule that, with few exceptions the world's history, the higher the development, e more complex the organisation and the more olent the clashing of the divers elements of e man's nature ; so that his soul resembles a ld of battle, and he wears out quickly. Never-eless, because everything in Balzac seems contra-ctory, when he is likened by one of his friends to e sea, which is one and indivisible, we perceive at the comparison is not inapt. Round the dge are the ever-restless waves ; on the surface e foam blown by fitful gusts of wind, the anslucent play of sunbeams, and the clamour of orms lashing up the billows ; but down in the mbre depths broods the resistless, immovable

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 77.

force which tinges with its reflection the danci and play above, and is the genius and fascinati
the mystery and tragedy of the sea.

Below the merriment and herculean jollity, little represented in his books, there was de gloomy force in the soul of the man who, gif with an almost unparalleled imagination, wo yet grip the realities of the pathetic and terri situations he evolved with brutal strength insistence. The mind of the writer of "Le P Goriot," "La Cousine Bette," and "Le Cou Pons," those terrible tragedies where the Gr god Fate marches on his victims relentlessly, there is no staying of the hand for pity, could have been merely a wide, sunny expanse with dark places. Nevertheless, we are again puzz when we attempt to realise the personality man whose imagination could soar to the myst and philosophical conception of "Séraphita," wh is full of religious poetry, and who yet had power in "César Birotteau" to invest prosaic even sordid details with absolute verisimilitude in the "Contes Drôlatiques" would write, in French, stories of Rabelaisian breadth and hum
The only solution of these contradictions is t partly perhaps by reason of great physical stren certainly because of an abnormally powerful b and imagination, Balzac's thoughts, feelings, passions were unusually strong, and were endo with peculiar impetus and independence of other; and from this resulted a versatility w

aused most unexpected developments, and which ills us of smaller mould with astonishment.

Nevertheless, steadfastness was decidedly the groundwork of the character of the man who was ot dismayed by the colossal task of the Comédie Humaine; but pursued his work through discouragement, ill health, and anxieties. Except near the end of his life, when, owing to the unreasonable strain to which it had been subjected, his powerful organism had begun to fail, Balzac refused to neglect his vocation even for his love affairs—a self-control which must have been a severe test to one of his temperament.

This absorption in his work cannot have been very flattering to the ladies he admired; and one plausible explanation of Madame de Castries' coldness to his suit is that she did not believe in the devotion of a lover who, while paying her the most assiduous court at Aix, would yet write from five in the morning till half-past five in the evening, and only bestow his company on her from six till an early bedtime. Even the adored Madame Hanska had to take a second place where work was concerned. When they were both at Vienna in 1835, he writes with some irritation, apparently in answer to a remonstrance on her part, that he cannot work when he knows he has to go out; and that, owing to the time he spent the evening before in her society, he must now shut himself up for fourteen hours and toil at "Le Lys dans la Vallée." He adds, with his customary force of who has complained of his frivolity, he cr dignantly: "Frivolity of character! Wh speak as a good bourgeois would have done seeing Napoleon turn to the right, to th and on all sides to examine his field of would have said, 'This man cannot remain place; he has no fixed idea!'" *

This change of posture, though consona Balzac says, with real stability, is a sou bewilderment to the reader of his saying doings, till it dawns upon him that, through policy, and the usual shrinking of the sensitiv casting their pearls before swine, Balzac confirmed poseur, so that what he tells us i more misleading than his silence. Léon G books are a striking instance of the fact tha all Balzac's jollity, his camaraderie, and his words, he did not readily reveal himself, exc those whom he could thoroughly trust to stand him. Gozlan went about with Balza often, and was specially chosen by him tim time as a companion; but he really knew little of the great man. If we compare his a of Balzac's feeling or want of feeling at a crisis, and then read what is written on th subject to Madame Hanska, Balzac's en

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

power of reserve, and his habit of deliberately misleading those who were not admitted to his confidence, may be gauged.

George Sand tells us an anecdote which shows how easily, from his anxiety not to wear his heart upon his sleeve, Balzac might be misunderstood. He dined with her on January 29th, 1844, after a visit to Russia, and related at table, with peals of laughter and apparently enormous satisfaction, an instance which had come under his notice of the ferocious exercise of absolute power. Any stranger listening, would have thought him utterly heartless and brutal, but George Sand knew better. She whispered to him: "That makes you inclined to cry, doesn't it?"* He answered nothing; left off laughing, as if a spring in him had broken; was very serious for the rest of the evening, and did not say a word more about Russia.

Balzac looked on the world as an arena; and as the occasion and the audience arose, he suited himself with the utmost aplomb to the part he intended to play, so that under the costume and the paint the real Balzac is often difficult to discover. Sometimes he would pretend to be rich and prosperous, when he thought an editor would thereby be induced to offer him good terms; and sometimes, when it suited his purpose, he would make the most of his poverty and of his pecuniary embarrassments. Madame Hanska, from whom he required sympathy, heard much of his desperate situation after the failure of Werdet, whom he likens to the vulture that tormented Prometheus; but as it would not answer for Émile de Girardin, the editor of La Presse, to know much about Balzac's pecuniary difficulties, Madame de Girardin is assured that the report of Werdet's supposed disaster is false, and Balzac virtuously remarks that in the present century honesty is never believed in.* Sometimes his want of candour appears to have its origin in his hatred to allow that he is beaten, and there is something childlike and naïve in his vanity. We are amused when he informs Madame Hanska that he is giving up the Chronique de Paris—which, after a brilliant flourish of trumpets at the start, was a complete failure—because the speeches in the Chambre des Députés are so silly that he abandons the idea of taking up politics, as he had intended to do by means of journalism. In a later letter, however, he is obliged to own that, though the Chronique has been, of course, a brilliant success, money is lacking, owing to the wickedness of several abandoned characters, and that therefore he has been forced to bring the publication to an end.

* "Autour de la Table," by George Sand.

Of one vanity he was completely free. He did not pose to posterity. Of his books he thought much—each one was a masterpiece, more glorious than the last; but he never imagined that people would be in the least interested in his doings, and he did not care about their opinion of him. Nevertheless there was occasionally a gleam of joy, when some one unexpectedly showed spontaneous admiration for his work. For instance, in a Viennese concert-room, where the whole audience had risen to do honour to the great author, a young man seized his hand and put it to his lips, saying, "I kiss the hand that wrote 'Séraphita,' and Balzac said afterwards to his sister, "They may deny my talent, if they choose, but the memory of that student will always comfort me."

* "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," p. 152, by Le Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

His genius would, he hoped, be acknowledged one day by all the world; but there was a singular and lovable absence of self-consciousness in his character, and a peculiar humility and childlikeness under his braggadocio and apparent arrogance. Perhaps this was the source of the power of fascination he undoubtedly exercised over his contemporaries. Nothing is more noticeable to any one reading about Balzac than the difference between the tone of amused indulgence with which those who knew him personally, speak of his peculiarities, and the contemptuous or horrified comments of people who only heard from others of his extraordinary doings.

He had bitter enemies as well as devoted friends; and his fighting proclivities, his objection to allow that he is ever in the wrong, and his habit of blaming others for his misfortunes, have had a great effect in obscuring our knowledge of Balzac's life, as the people he abused were naturally exasperated, and took up their pens, not to g fair account of what really happened, but to ju themselves against Balzac's aspersions. We book is an instance of this. Beneath the travagant admiration he expresses for the " writer," with his "heart of gold," a glint ca seen from time to time of the animus v inspired him when he wrote, and we feel tha statements must be received with caution, an not add much to our real knowledge of Balzac

Nevertheless, though there are still blank sp to be filled, as well as difficulties to overc and puzzles to unravel, much fresh inform has lately been discovered about the great w notably the "Lettres à l'Étrangère," publishe 1899, a collection of some of the letters writte Balzac, from 1833 to 1848, to Madame Ha the Polish lady who afterwards became his These letters, which are the property of Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, give n interesting details, and alter the earlier vie several points in Balzac's career and character ;
the volume is large, and takes some time to
It is therefore thought, that as those who w seem competent, by their knowledge and to overcome the difficulties of writing a comp and exhaustive life are silent, a short ske which can claim nothing more than correct of detail, may not be unwelcome. It cont no attempt to give what could only be a inadequate criticism of the books of the g elist; for that, the reader must be referred to ıy able works by learned Frenchmen who have le a lifelong study of the subject. It is ten, however, in the hope that the admirers of ugénie Grandet" and "Le Père Goriot" may to read something of the author of these terpieces, and that even those who only know great French novelist by reputation may be rested to hear a little about the restless life of ıan who was a slave to his genius—was driven its insistent voice to engage in work which enormously difficult to him, to lead an rmal and unhealthy life, and to wear out his berant physical strength prematurely. He died

h his powers at their highest and his great task inished; and a sense of thankfulness for his own diocrity fills the reader, when he reaches the of the life of Balzac.

CHAPTER II

Balzac's appearance, dress, and personality—His imaginary world and schemes for making money—His family, childhood, and school-days.

ACCORDING to Théophile Gautier, herculean jollity was the most striking characteristic of the great writer, whose genius excels in sombre and often sordid tragedy. George Sand, too, speaks of Balzac's "serene soul with a smile in it"; and this was the more remarkable, because he lived at a time when discontent and despair were considered the sign-manual of talent.

Physically Balzac was far from satisfying a romantic ideal of fragile and enervated genius. Short and stout, square of shoulder, with an abundant mane of thick black hair—a sign of bodily vigour—his whole person breathed intense vitality. Deep red lips, thick, but finely curved, and always ready to laugh, attested, like the ruddiness in his full cheeks, to the purity and richness of his blood. His forehead, high, broad, and unwrinkled, save for a line between the eyes, and his neck, thick, round, and columnar, contrasted in their whiteness with the colour in the rest of the face. His hands were large and dimpled—"beautiful hands," his sister calls them. He was proud of them, and had a slight prejudice against according to Gautier, there were none like them.* They had inconceivable life, light, and magnetism. They were eyes to make an eagle lower his lids, to read through walls and hearts, to terrify a wild beast—eyes of a sovereign, a seer, a conqueror. Lamartine likens them to "darts dipped in kindliness." Balzac's sister speaks of them as brown; but, according to other contemporaries, they were like brilliant black diamonds, with rich reflections of gold, the white of the eyeballs being tinged with blue. They seemed to be lit with the fire of the genius within, to read souls, to answer questions before they were asked, and at the same time to pour out warm rays of kindliness from a joyous heart.

At all points Balzac's personality differed from that of his contemporaries of the Romantic School—those transcendental geniuses of despairing temper, who were utterly hopeless about the prosaic world in which, by some strange mistake, they found themselves; and from which they felt that no possible inspiration for their art could be drawn. So little attuned were these unfortunates to their commonplace surroundings that, after picturing in their writings either fiendish horrors, or a beautiful, impossible atmosphere, peopled by beings out of whom all likeness to humanity had been eliminated, they not infrequently lost their mental balance altogether, or hurried by their own act out of a dull world which could never satisfy their lively imaginations. Balzac, on the other hand, loved the world. How, with the acute powers of observation, and the intuition, amounting almost to second sight, with which he was gifted, could he help doing so? The man who could at will quit his own personality, and invest himself with that of another; who would follow a workman and his wife on their way home at night from a music-hall, and listen to their discussions on domestic matters till he imbibed their life, felt their ragged clothing on his back, and their desires and wants in his soul,—how could he find life dull, or the most commonplace individual uninteresting?

* "Portraits Contemporains—Honoré de Balzac," by Théophile Gautier.

In dress Balzac was habitually careless. He would rush to the printer's office, after twelve hours of hard work, with his hat drawn over his eyes, his hands thrust into shabby gloves, and his feet in shoes with high sides, worn over loose trousers, which were pleated at the waist and held down with straps. Even in society he took no trouble about his appearance, and Lamartine describes him as looking, in the salon of Madame de Girardin, like a schoolboy who has outgrown his clothes. Only for a short time, which he describes with glee in his letters to Madame Hanska, did he pose as a man of fashion. Then he wore a agnificent white waistcoat, and a blue coat with ld buttons ; carried the famous cane, with a knob udded with turquoises, celebrated in Madame Girardin's story, "La Canne de Monsieur de alzac" ; and drove in a tilbury, behind a highepping horse, with a tiny tiger, whom he christened nchise, perched on the back seat. This phase as quickly over, the horses were sold, and Balzac peared no more in the box reserved for dandies the Opera. Of the fashionable outfit, the ly property left was the microscopic groom—an phan, of whom Balzac took the greatest care, and hom he visited daily during the boy's last illness, year or two after. Thenceforward he reverted his usual indifference about appearances, his ly vanity being the spotless cleanliness of his orking costume—a loose dressing-gown of white annel or cashmere, made like the habit of a enedictine monk, which was kept in round the aist by a silk girdle, and was always scrupulously uarded from ink-stains.

Naïve as a child, anxious for sympathy, frankly elighted with his own masterpieces, yet modest in fashion peculiar to himself, Balzac gave a domi-ant impression of kindliness and bonhomie, which vershadowed even the idea of intellect. To his ends he is not in the first place the author of he "Comédie Humaine," designed, as George and rather grandiloquently puts it, to be "an most universal examination of the ideas, sentients, customs, habits, legislation, arts, trades, jokes, often Rabelaisian in flavour. Of course there was another side to the picture, and there were times in his hardset and harassing life when even his vivacity failed him. These moods were, however, never apparent in society; and even to his intimate men friends, such as Théophile Gautier and Léon Gozlan, Balzac was always the delightful, whimsical companion, to be thought of and written of afterwards with an amused, though affectionate smile. Only to women, his principal confidantes, who played as important a part in his life as they do in his books, did he occasionally show the discouragement to which the artistic nature is prone. Sometimes the state of the weather, which always had a great effect on him, the difficulty of his work, the fatigue of sitting up all night, and his monetary embarrassments, brought him to an extreme state of depression, both physical and mental. He would arrive at the house of Madame Surville, his sister, who tells the story, hardly able to drag himself along, in a gloomy, dejected state, with his skin sallow and jaundiced.

"Don't console me," he would say in a faint voice, dropping into a chair; "it is useless—I am a dead man."

* "Autour de la Table," by George Sand.

by way of conclusion.

"Yes, I am a wrecked man, sister!"

"Nonsense! No man is wrecked with such proofs as those to correct."

Then he would raise his head, his face would unpucker little by little, the sallow tones of his skin would disappear.

"My God, you are right!" he would say. "Those books will make me live. Besides, blind Fortune is here, isn't she? Why shouldn't she protect a Balzac as well as a ninny? And there are always ways of wooing her. Suppose one of my millionaire friends (and I have some), or a banker, not knowing what to do with his money, should come to me and say, 'I know your immense talents, and your anxieties: you want such-and-such a sum to free yourself; accept it fearlessly: you will pay me; your pen is worth millions!' That is all I want, my dear."*

Then the "child-man," as his sister calls him, would imagine himself a member of the Institute; then in the Chamber of Peers, pointing out and reforming abuses, and governing a highly prosperous country. Finally, he would end the interview

* "Balzac, sa Vie et ses Œuvres, d'après la Correspondance," by Mme L. Surville (née de Balzac).

its news, as others do that of the real world. Sometimes he was delighted at the grand match he had planned for his hero; but often affairs did not go so well, and perhaps it would give him much anxious thought to marry his heroine suitably, as it was necessary to find her a husband in her own set, and this might be difficult to arrange. When asked about the past of one of his creations, he replied gravely that he "had not been acquainted with Monsieur de Jordy before he came to Nemours," but added that, if his questioner were anxious to know, he would try to find out. He had many fancies about names, declaring that those which are invented do not give life to imaginary beings, whereas those really borne by some one endow them with vitality. Léon Gozlan says that he was dragged by Balzac half over Paris in search of a suitable name for the hero of a story to be published in the Revue Parisienne. After they had trudged through scores of streets in vain, Balzac, to his intense joy, discovered "Marcas" over a small tailor's shop, to which he added, as "a flame, a plume, a star," the initial Z. Z. Marcas conveyed to him the idea of a great, though unknown, philosopher, poet, or versmith, like Benvenuto Cellini; he went no rther, he was satisfied—he had found "the name names." *

Many are the amusing anecdotes told of Balzac's hemes for becoming rich. Money he struggled r unceasingly, not from sordid motives, but cause it was necessary to his conception of a ppy life. Without its help he could never be eed from his burden of debt, and united to the ande dame of his fancy, who must of neces- y be posed in elegant toilette, on a suitable ckground of costly brocades and objects of art. evertheless, in spite of all his efforts, and of a pacity and passion for work which seemed almost erhuman, he never obtained freedom from onetary anxiety. Viewed in this light, there pathos in his many impossible plans for making s fortune, and freeing himself from the strain nich was slowly killing him.

Some of his projected enterprises were wildly ntastic, and prove that the great author was, like ny a genius, a child at heart; and that, in his es, the world was not the prosaic place it is most men and women, but an enchanted globe, ke the world of "Treasure Island," teeming with e possibility of strange adventure. At one time hoped to gain a substantial income by growing neapples in the little garden at Les Jardies, and ter on he thought money might be made by ansporting oaks from Poland to France. For the negroes he had employed to bury it, lest they should betray its hiding-place. Jules Sandeau and Théophile Gautier were chosen to assist in the enterprise of carrying off the hidden gold, and were each to receive a quarter of the treasure, Balzac, as the leader of the venture, taking the other half. The three friends were to start secretly and separately with spades and shovels, and, their work accomplished, were to put the treasure on a brig which was to be in waiting, and were to return as millionaires to France. This brilliant plan failed, because none of the three adventurers had at the moment money to pay his passage out; and no doubt, by the time that the necessary funds were forthcoming, Balzac's fertile brain was engaged on other enterprises.*

* "Balzac en Pantoufles," by Léon Gozlan.

The foundation of his pecuniary misfortunes was laid before his birth, when his father, forty-five years old and unmarried, sank the bulk of his fortune in life annuities, so that his son was in the unfortunate position of starting life in very comfortable circumstances, and of finding himself in want of money just when he most needed it.

Balzac's father was born in Languedoc in 1746, and we are told by his son that he had been

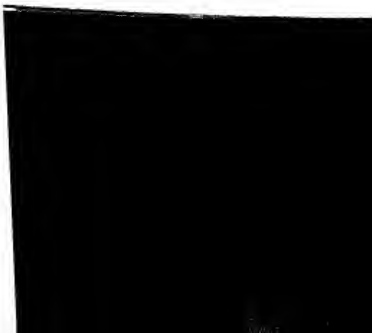

* "Portraits Contemporains—Honoré de Balzac," by Théophile Gautier.

Secretary, and by Madame Surville, advocate, of the Council under Louis XVI. Both these statements however appear to be incorrect, and may be considered to have been harmless fictions on the part of the old gentleman, as no record of his name can be found in the Royal Calendar, which was very carefully kept. Almanacs are awkward things, and his name is mentioned in the National Calendar of 1793 as a "lawyer" and "member of the general council for the section of the rights of man in the Commune." But he evidently preferred to draw a veil over his revolutionary experiences, and it seems rather hard that, because he happened to possess a celebrated son, his little secrets should be exposed to the light of day. Later on he became an ardent Royalist, and in 1814 he joined with Bertrand de Molleville to draw up a memoir against the Charter, which Balzac says was dictated to him, then a boy of fifteen; and he also mentions that he remembers hearing M. de Molleville cry out, "The Constitution ruined Louis XVI., and the Charter will kill the Bourbons!" "No compromise" formed an essential part of the creed of the Royalists at the Restoration.

When M. de Balzac * married, in 1797, he was in charge of the Commissariat of the Twenty-second Military Division; and in 1798 he came to live in Tours, where he had bought a house and some land near the town, and where he remained for favourite subject—that of health. He seems to have been a man of much originality, many peculiarities, and much kindness of heart. He was evidently impulsive, like his celebrated son, and he certainly made a culpable mistake, and a cruel one for his family, when he rashly concluded that he should always remain a bachelor, and arranged that his income should die with him. He afterwards hoped to repair the wrong he had thus done to his children, by outliving the other shareholders and obtaining a part of the immense capital of the Tontine. Fortunately for himself he possessed extraordinary optimism, and power of excluding from his mind the possibility of all unpleasant contingencies—qualities which he handed on in full measure to Honoré. He therefore kept himself happy in the monetary disappointments of his later life, by thinking and talking of the millions his children would inherit from their centenarian father. For their sakes it was necessary that he should take care of his health, and he considered that, by maintaining the "equilibrium of the vital forces," there was absolutely no doubt that he would live for a hundred years or more. Therefore he followed a strict regimen, and gave himself an infinite amount of trouble, as well as amusement, by his minute arrangements.

* The Balzac family will be accorded the "de" in this account of them.

Unfortunately, however, the truth of his theories could never be tested, as he died in 1829, at the age of eighty-three, from the effects of an operation; and Madame de Balzac and her family were left to face the stern facts of life, denuded of the rose-coloured haze in which they had been clothed by the kindly old enthusiast. Balzac's mother certainly had a hard life, and from what we hear of her nervous, excitable nature—inherited apparently from her mother, Madame Sallambier—we can hardly be astonished when Balzac writes to Madame Hanska, in 1835, that if her misfortunes do not kill her, it is feared they will destroy her reason. Nevertheless, she outlived her celebrated son, and is mentioned by Victor Hugo, when he visited Balzac's deathbed, as the only person in the room, except a nurse and a servant.*

She was many years younger than her husband—a beauty and an heiress; and she evidently had her own way with the easy-going old M. de Balzac, and was the moving spirit in the household: so that the ease and absence of friction in her early life must have made her subsequent troubles and humiliations especially galling. Besides Honoré, she had three children: Laure, afterwards Madame Surville; Laurence, who died young; and Henry, the black sheep of the family, who returned from the colonies, after having made an unsatisfactory a M. Saint-Pierre de Montzaigle, apparently a good deal older than herself; and Honoré gives a very couleur de rose account of his future brother-in-law's family, in a letter written at the time of the engagement to Laure, who was already married. He does not seem so charmed with the bridegroom, il troubadouro, as with his surroundings, and remarks that he has lost his top teeth, and is very conceited, but will do well enough—as a husband. Every one is delighted at the marriage; but Laure can imagine maman's state of nervous excitement from her recollection of the last few days before her own wedding, and can fancy that he and Laurence are not enjoying themselves. "Nature surrounds roses with thorns, and pleasures with a crowd of troubles. Mamma follows the example of nature."*

* "Choses Vues," by Victor Hugo.

Laurence's death, in 1826, must have been a terrible grief to the poor mother; but she may have realised later on that her daughter had escaped much trouble, as in 1836 the Balzac family threatened M. de Montzaigle with a lawsuit on the subject of his son, who was left to wander about Paris without food, shoes, or clothes. We cannot pose that any one with such sketchy views of duties of a father could have been a particu- y satisfactory husband; but perhaps Laurence l before she had time to discover M. de ntzaigle's deficiencies.

* "H. de Balzac—Correspondance," vol. i. p. 41.

Henry, the younger son, appears to have been ught up on a different method from that sued with Honoré, as we hear in 1821 that dame de Balzac considered that the boy was appy and bored with school, that he was with ting people who punished him for nothing, and st be taken away. Evidently the younger son s the mother's darling; but her mode of bringing n up was not happy in its effects, as he seems have given continual anxiety and trouble. He ne back from the colonies with his wife; and by eatening to blow out his brains, he worked on his ther's feelings, and induced her to help him with ney, and nearly to ruin herself. In consequence was obliged for a time to take up her abode h Honoré, an arrangement which did not work ll. Even when Henry was at last shipped off the Indies, he continued to agitate his family by ding them pathetic accounts of his distress and essities, and these letters from her much-loved must have been peculiarly painful to Madame Balzac.

Honoré and his mother seem never to have derstood each other very well; and she was rn with him and Laure in their youth, while she ished caresses on her younger children. Like-youth, the paternal type of imagination [illegible] would be repeated.

She was not a tender mother in childhood, when indeed she saw little of Honoré, as she left him out at nurse till he was four years old, and sent him to school when he was eight; but later on in all practical matters she did her best for him, lending him money when he was in difficulties, and looking after his business affairs when he was away from Paris. She was evidently easily offended, and rather absurdly tenacious of her maternal dignity; so that sometimes the deference and submission of the great writer are surprising and rather touching. On the other hand it must be remembered that Honoré made great demands on his friends, that they were expected to accord continual sympathy and admiration, to be perfectly tactful in their criticisms, and were only very occasionally allowed to give advice. Therefore his opinion of his mother's coldness may have sprung from her failure to answer to the requirements of his peculiar code of affection, and not from any real want of love on her part.

Certainly her severity in his youth had the effect of concentrating the whole devotion of Honoré's childish heart on Laure, the cara sorella of his later years. She was a writer, the author of "Le pagnon du Foyer." To her we owe a charm-sketch of her celebrated brother, and she was confidante of his hopes, ambitions, and troubles, sentimental friendships, and of the faults and arrassments which he confided to no one else.

ressions of affection for her occur constantly is letters, and in 1837 he writes to Madame ska that Laure is ill, and therefore the e universe seems out of gear, and that he es whole nights in despair because she is ything to him. The friendship between the ner and sister was deep, devoted, and faithful, Balzac's friendships generally were—he did not as he said in one of his letters, for amitiés derme—and the restriction put on his inter-se with his sister by the jealousy of M. Surville one of the many troubles which darkened his years.

ccasionally, indeed, there were disagreements veen the brother and sister, when Honoré did approve of Laure's aspirations for authorship.
only subject which really caused coldness on sides, however—and this was temporary—was re's want of sympathy for Balzac's attachment Madame Hanska; because she, like many of his nds, felt doubtful whether his passionate love returned in anything like an equal measure.
haps, too, there may have lurked in the sister's a slight jealousy of this alien grande dame, had stolen away her brother's heart from nce, who moved in a sphere quite unlike that of his "polar star." It must have been distinctly annoying, when the virtues, talents, and charms of the young Countess Anna were held up as an object lesson for Madame Surville's two daughters, who were no doubt, from their mother's point of view, quite as admirable as Madame Hanska's ewe lamb. Nevertheless, there was never any real separation between the brother and sister; and it is to Laure that—certain of her participation in his joy—poor Balzac penned his delighted letter the day after his wedding, signed "Thy brother Honoré, at the summit of happiness."

Laure's own career was chequered. In 1820 she married an engineer, M. Midy de la Greneraye Surville, and from the first the marriage was not very happy, as Honoré writes, a month after it took place, to blame Laure for her melancholy at the separation from her family, and to counsel philosophy and piano practice. Possibly Balzac's habits of ascendency over those he loved, and his wonderful gift of fascination—a gift which often provides its possessor with bitter enemies among those outside its influence—made matters difficult for his brother-in-law, and did not tend to promote harmony between Laure and her husband. M. Surville probably became exasperated by useless attempts to vie in his wife's eyes with her much-beloved brother—at any rate, in later years he was tyrannical in preventing their intercourse, and we hear of the unfortunate Laure coming in secret to see Balzac, on her birthday in 1836, and holding a watch in her hand, because she did not dare to stay away longer than twenty minutes. There were other worries for Laure and her husband, for, like the rest of the Balzac family, they were in continual difficulty about money matters. M. Surville seems to have been a man of enterprise, and to have had many schemes on hand—such as making a lateral canal on the Loire from Nantes to Orleans, building a bridge in Paris, or constructing a little railway. Speaking of the canal, Balzac cheerfully and airily remarked in 1836 that only a capital of twenty-six millions of francs required collecting, and then the Survilles would be on the high road to prosperity. This trifling matter was not after all arranged, if we may judge from the fact that in 1849 the Survilles moved to a cheap lodging, and were advised by Balzac, in a letter from Russia, to follow his habit of former days, and to cook only twice a week. In fact, they were evidently passing through one of those monetary crises to which we become used when reading the annals of the Balzacs, and which irresistibly remind the reader of similar affairs in the Micawber family.

In spite of the friction on the subject of Madame affairs. He evidently had great faith in his brother-in-law's plans for making his fortune, and took the keenest interest in them, even offering to go over to London, to sell an invention for effecting economy in the construction of inclined planes on railways. But M. Surville changed his mind at the last, and Balzac never went to England after all.

Honoré and Laure were together during the time of their earliest childhood, as they were left at the cottage of the same foster-mother, and did not come home till Honoré was four years old. His sister says, "My recollections of his tenderness date far back. I have not forgotten the headlong rapidity with which he ran to save me from tumbling down the three high steps without a railing, which led from our nurse's room to the garden. His loving protection continued after we returned to our father's house, where, more than once, he allowed himself to be punished for my faults, without betraying me. Once, when I came upon the scene in time to accuse myself of the wrong, he said, 'Don't acknowledge next time—I like to be punished for you.'" *

* "Balzac, sa vie et ses œuvres, d'après sa correspondance," by Madame L. Surville (née de Balzac).

Both children were in great awe of their parents, and Honoré's fear of his mother was extreme. Years after, he told a friend that he was never able to hear her voice without a trembling which deprived him of his faculties. Their father treated them with uniform kindness, but Honoré's heart was filled with love for his kind grandparents, to whom he paid a visit in Paris in 1804. He came back to Tours with wonderful stories of the beauties of their house, their garden, and their big dog Mouche, with whom he had made great friends. The news of his grandfather's death a few months later was a great grief to him, and made a deep impression on his childish mind. His sister tells us that long afterwards, when the two were receiving a reprimand from their mother, and he saw Laure unable to control a wild burst of laughter, which he knew would lead to serious consequences, he tried to stop her by whispering in tragic tones, "Think about your grandfather's death!"

He was a child of very deep affections and warmth of heart, but he did not show any special intelligence. He was lively, merry, and extremely talkative, but sometimes a silent mood would fall on him, and perhaps, as his sister says, his imagination was then carrying him to distant worlds, though the family only thought the chatterbox was tired. In all ways, however, he was in these days a very ordinary child, devoted to fairy stories, fond of the popular nursery amusement of making up his music.

This happy childish life, chastened only by the tremors which both children felt when taken by their governess in the morning and at bedtime into the stern presence of their mother, did not last very long for Honoré. When he was eight years old (his sister says seven, but this seems to be a mistake), there was a sudden change in his life, as the home authorities decided that it was time his education should begin in good earnest. He was therefore taken from the day school at Tours, and sent to the semi-military college founded by the Oratorians in the sleepy little town of Vendôme. On page 7 of the school record there is the following notice: "No. 460. Honoré Balzac, âgé de huit ans un mois. A eu la petite vérole, sans infirmités. Caractère sanguin, s'échauffant facilement, et sujet à quelques fièvres de chaleur. Entré au pensionnat le 22 juin, 1807. Sorti, le 22 août, 1813. S'adresser à M. Balzac, son père, à Tours."* Thus is summed up the character of the future writer of the "Comédie Humaine," and there was apparently nothing remarkable or precocious about the boy, as his quick temper is his most salient point in the eyes of his masters. It will be noticed, too, that

* "Balzac au Collège," by Champfleury.

"de," about which Balzac was very particular, which was the occasion of many scoffing arks on the part of his enemies, does not appear this register.

Honoré was a small boy to have been completely arated from home, and the whole scheme of ication as devised by the Oratorian fathers pears to have been a strange one. One of the es forbade outside holidays, and Honoré never the college once during the six years he was at ool; so that there was no supervision from his ents, and no chance of complaint if he were appy or ill treated. His family came to see at Easter and also at the prize-givings; but on se occasions, to which he looked forward, his er tells us, with eager delight, reproaches were erally his portion, on account of his want of cess in school work. In "Louis Lambert" he es an interesting account of the college, which in the middle of the town on the little river r, and contained a chapel, theatre, infirmary, ery, and gardens. There were two or three dred pupils, divided according to their ages attainments into four classes—les grands, les ens, les petits, and les minimes—and each class its own class-room and courtyard. Balzac was sidered the idlest and most apathetic boy in division, and was continually punished. Re- aches, the ferule, the dark cell, were his portion, with his quick and delicate senses he suffered nsely from the want of air in the class-rooms.

being only renewed once in the day. To add to the odours, the air was vitiated by the smell of pigeons killed for fête days, and of dishes stolen from the refectory, and kept by the pupils in their lockers. The boy who, in the future, was to awaken actual physical disgust in his readers by his description of the stuffy and dingy boarding-house dining-room in "Le Père Goriot," was crushed and stupefied by his surroundings, and would sit for hours with his head on his hand, not attempting to learn, but gazing dreamily at the clouds, or at the foliage of the trees in the court below. No wonder that he was the despair of his masters, and that his famous "Traité de la volonté," which he composed instead of preparing the ordinary school work, was summarily confiscated and destroyed. So many were the punishment lines given him to write, that his holidays were almost entirely taken up, and he had not six days of liberty the whole time that he was at the college.

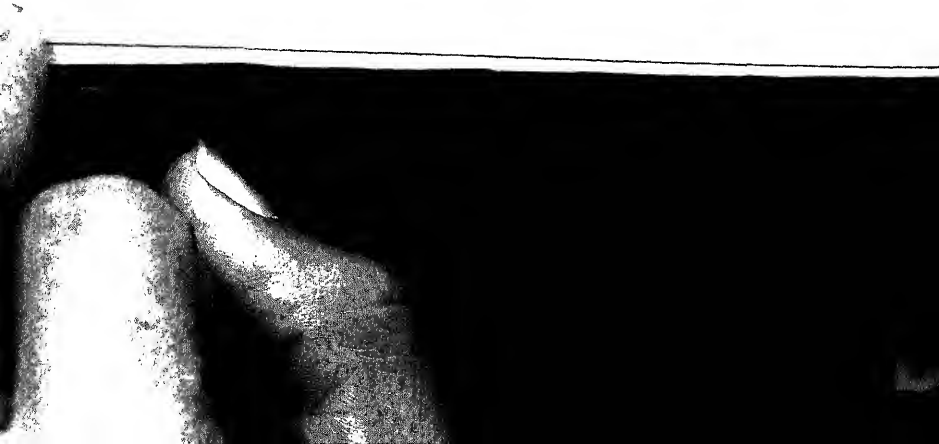

In addition to the troubles incident to Honoré's peculiar temperament and genius, he had in the winter, like the other pupils, to submit to actual physical suffering. The price of education included also that of clothing, the parents who sent their children to the Vendôme College paying a yearly sum, and therewith comfortably absolving themselves from all trouble and responsibility. But the results were not happy for the boys, who dragged themselves painfully along the icy roads in miserable remnants of boots, their feet half dead, and swollen with sores and chilblains. Out of sixty children, not ten walked without torture, and many of them would cry with rage as they limped along, each step being a painful effort; but with the invincible physical pluck and moral cowardice of childhood, would hide their tears, for fear of ridicule from their companions.

Nevertheless, even to Balzac, who was peculiarly unfitted for it, life at the college had its pleasures. The food appears to have been good, and the discipline at meals not very severe, as a regular system of exchange of helpings to suit the particular tastes of each boy went on all through dinner, and caused endless amusement. Some one who had received peas as his portion would prefer dessert, and the proposition "Un dessert pour des pois" would pass from mouth to mouth till the bargain had been made. Other pleasures were the pet pigeons, the gardens, the sweets bought secretly during the walks, the permission to play cards and to have theatrical performances during the holidays, the military music, the games, and the slides made in winter. Best of all, however, was the shop which opened in the class-room every Sunday during playtime for the sale of boxes, tools, pigeons of all sorts, mass-books (for these there was not much of the glorious time coming in the afternoon. Next Sunday was not quite so delightful, as probably there were only a few sous left, and possibly some of the purchases were broken, or had not turned out quite satisfactorily. Then, too, there was a long vista of Sundays in the future, without any possibility of shopping; but after all a certain amount of compounding is always necessary in life, and an intense short joy is worth a grey time before and after.

When Balzac was fourteen years old, his life at the college came suddenly to an end, as, to the alarm of his masters, he was attacked by coma with feverish symptoms, and they begged his parents to take him home at once. It is curious to notice that the Fathers make no reference to this failure in their educational system in the school record, where there is no reason given for Honoré's departure from school. Certainly his life at Vendôme was not very healthy, as sometimes for idleness, inattention, or impertinence he was for months shut up every day in a niche six feet square, with a wooden door pierced by holes to let in air. When Champfleury visited the college years afterwards, the only person who remembered Balzac was the old Father who had charge of these cells, and he spoke of the boy's "great black eyes." Confinement in these culottes de bois, as they were called, was much dreaded by the boys, and the punishment seems barbarous and senseless, except from the point of view of getting rid of troublesome pupils. Balzac, however, welcomed the relief from ordinary school life, and indeed manœuvred to be shut up. In the cells he had leisure to dream as he pleased, he was free from the drudgery of learning his lessons, and he managed to secrete books in his cage, and thus to absorb the contents of most of the volumes in the fine library collected by the learned Oratorian founders of the college. The ideas in many of the learned tomes were far beyond his age, but he understood them, remembered them afterwards, and could recall in later years not only the thoughts in each book, but also the disposition of his mind when he read them. Naturally this precocity of intellect caused brain fatigue, though this would never have been suspected by the Fathers of their idlest pupil.

Honoré, his sister tells us, came home thin and puny, like a somnambulist sleeping with open eyes, and his grandmother groaned over the strain of modern education. At first he heard hardly any of the questions that were put to him, and his mother was obliged to disturb him in reveries, and to insist on his taking part in games with the rest of the family ; but with the fresh air and the home and Latin. Nevertheless, at times he was astonishing, or might have been to any one with powers of observation. On these occasions he made such extraordinary and sagacious remarks that Madame de Balzac, in her character of represser, felt obliged to remark sharply, "You cannot possibly understand what you are saying, Honoré!" When Honoré, who dared not argue, looked at her with a smile, she would, with the ease of absolute authority, escape from the awkwardness of the situation by remarking that he was impertinent. He was already ambitious, and would tell his sisters and brother about his future fame, and accept with a laugh the teasing he received in consequence.

It must have been during this time that he grew to love with an enduring love the scenery of his native province of Touraine, with its undulating stretches of emerald green, through which the Loire or the Indre wound like a long ribbon of water, while lines of poplars decked the banks with moving lace. It was a smiling country, dotted with vineyards and oak woods, while here and there an old gnarled walnut tree stood in rugged independence. The susceptible boy, lately escaped from the abominations of the stuffy school-house, drank in with rapture the warm scented air, and often describes in his novels the landscape of the province where he was born, which he loves, in his own words, "as an artist loves art." Another lasting memory * was that of the poetry and splendour of the Cathedral of Saint-Gatien in Tours, where he was taken every feast-day. There he watched with delight the beautiful effects of light and shade, the play of colour produced by the rays of sunlight shining through the old stained glass, and the strange, fascinating effect of the clouds of incense, which enveloped the officiating priests, and from which he possibly derived the idea of the mists which he often introduces into his descriptions.

* See "Balzac, sa Vie et ses Œuvres, d'après sa Correspondance" par Madame L. Surville (née de Balzac).

CHAPTER III

1814—1820

Balzac's tutors and law studies—His youth, as pictured in the "Peau de Chagrin"—His father's intention of making him a lawyer—He begs to be allowed to become a writer—Is allowed his wish—Life in the Rue Lesdiguières, privations and starvation—He writes "Cromwell," a tragedy.

At the end of 1814 the Balzac family moved to Paris, as M. de Balzac was put in charge of the Commissariat of the First Division of the Army. Here they took a house in the Rue de Roi-Doré, in the Marais, and Honoré continued his studies with M. Lepitre, Rue Saint-Louis, and MM. Sganzer and Benzelin, Rue de Thorigny, in the Marais. To the influence of M. Lepitre, a man who, unlike old M. de Balzac and many other worthy people, was an ardent Legitimist before as well as after 1815, we may in part trace the strength of Balzac's Royalist principles. On the 13th Vendémiaire, M. Lepitre had presided over one of the sections of Paris which rose against the Convention; and though on one occasion he failed in nerve, his services during the Revolution had been most conspicuous. On his reception at the Tuileries by the Duchesse d'Angoulême, she used these words, never to be forgotten by him to whom they were addressed: "I have not forgotten, and I shall never forget, the services you have rendered to my family." *

We can imagine the enthusiasm and delight with which the man who, whatever might be his shortcomings in courage, had always remained firm to his Royalist principles, and who had been a witness of the terrible anguish of the prisoners in the Temple, would hear these words from the lips of the lady who stood to him as Queen—the Antigone of France—the heroine whose sufferings had made the heart of every loyal Frenchman bleed, the brave woman who, according to Napoleon, was the one man of her family. Lepitre's visit to the Tuileries took place on May 9th, 1814, the year that Balzac began to take those lessons in rhetoric which first opened his eyes to the beauty of the French language. During Lepitre's tuition he composed a speech supposed to be addressed by the wife of Brutus to her husband, after the condemnation of her sons, in which, Laure tells us, the anguish of the mother is depicted with great power, and Balzac shows his wonderful faculty for entering into the souls of his personages. Lepitre had evidently a powerful influence over his pupil, and as a master of rhetoric he would naturally be eloquent and have command of language, and in consequence would be most probably of fiery and enthusiastic temperament. We can imagine the fervour with which the impressionable boy drank in stories of the sufferings of the royal family during their imprisonment in the Temple, and strove not to miss a syllable of his master's magnificent exordiums, which glowed with the light and heat of impassioned loyalty.

* "Biographie Universelle," by De Michaud.

No doubt Balzac's "Une Vie de Femme," a touching account of the life of the Duchesse d'Angoulême, which appeared in the Réformateur in 1832, was partly compiled from the reminiscences of his old master; and when we hear of his ardent defence of the Duchesse de Berry, or that he treasured a tea-service which was not of any intrinsic value, because it had belonged to the Duc d'Angoulême, we see traces of his intense love and admiration for the Bourbon family.

Nevertheless, in that big, well-balanced brain there was room for many emotions, and for a wide range of sympathies. The many-sidedness which is a necessary characteristic of every great psychologist, was a remarkable quality in Balzac. He may have been present at Napoleon's last review on the Carrousel—at any rate he tells in "La Femme de Trente Ans" how the man "thus surrounded with so much love, enthusiasm, devotion, prayer—for whom the sun had driven every cloud from the sky—sat motionless on his horse, three feet in advance of the dazzling escort that followed him," and that an old grenadier said, "My God, yes, it was always so; under fire at Wagram, among the dead in the Moskowa, he was quiet as a lamb—yes, that's he!" Balzac's admiration for oleon was intense, as he shows in many of his ngs, and his proudest boast is to be found ne words, said to have been inscribed on tuette of Napoleon in his room in the Rue ni, "What he has begun with the sword, I finish with the pen."

one of Balzac's masters thought much of his ts, or perceived anything remarkable about He returned home in 1816, full of health vigour, the personification of happiness; and conscientious mother immediately set to work pair the deficiencies of his former education, sent him to lectures at the Sorbonne, where heard extempore speeches from such men as main, Guizot, and Cousin. Apparently this ning opened a new world to him, and he ed for the first time that education can be e than a dull routine of dry facts, and felt the joy ntact with eloquence and learning. Possibly ealised, as he had not realised before—Tours g, as he says, a most unliterary town—that there e people in the world who looked on things as d, and who would understand, and not laugh im or snub him. He always returned from e lectures, his sister says, glowing with interest, ould try as far as he could to repeat them to amily. Then he would rush out to study in ublic libraries, so that he might be able to t by the teaching of his illustrious professors, ould wander about the Latin Quarter, to hunt are and precious books. He used his opportunities in other ways. An old lady living in the house with the Balzacs had been an intimate friend of the great Beaumarchais. Honoré loved to talk to her, and would ask her questions, and listen with the greatest interest to her replies, till he could have written a Life of the celebrated man himself. His powers of acute observation, interest, and sympathy—in short, his intense faculty for human fellowship, as well as his capacity for assimilating information from books—were already at work; and the future novelist was consciously or unconsciously collecting material in all directions.

In 1816 it was considered necessary that he should be started with regular work, and he was established for eighteen months with a lawyer, M. de Guillonnet-Merville, who was, like M. Lepitre, a friend of the Balzac family, and an ardent Royalist. Eugène Scribe—another amateur lawyer—as M. de Guillonnet-Merville indulgently remarked, had just left the office, and Honoré was established at the desk and table vacated by him. He became very fond of his chief, whom he has immortalised as Derville in "Une Ténébreuse Affaire," "Le Père Goriot," and other novels; and he dedicated to this old friend "Un Épisode sous la Terreur," which was published in 1846, and is a powerful and touching story of the remorse felt by the executioner of Louis XVI. After eighteen months in this office, he passed the same time in that of M. Passez, a notary, who lived in the same house with the Balzacs, and was another of their intimates.

Balzac does not appear to have made any objection to these arrangements, though his legal studies cannot have been congenial to him; but they were only spoken of at this time as a finish to his education—old M. de Balzac, homme de loi himself, remarking that no man's education can be complete without a knowledge of ancient and modern legislation, and an acquaintance with the statutes of his own country. Perhaps Honoré, wiser now than in his school-days, had learnt that all knowledge is equipment for the work of the world, and especially for a literary life. He certainly made good use of his time, and the results can be seen in many of his works, notably in the "Ténébreuse Affaire," which contains in the account of the famous trial a masterly exposition of the legislature of the First Empire, or in "César Birotteau," which shows such thorough knowledge of the laws of bankruptcy of the time that its complicated plot cannot be thoroughly understood by any one unversed in legal matters.

Honoré was very well occupied at this time, and his mother must have felt for once thoroughly satisfied with him. In addition to his study of law, he had to follow the course of lectures at the Sorbonne and at the College of France; and these studies were a delightful excuse for a very fitful occupation of his seat in the lawyer's office. Besides his multifarious occupations, he managed in the evening to find time to play cards with his grandmother, who lived with her daughter and son-in-loved those games in memory of her; and the recollection of her sayings and of her gestures used to come to him like a happiness which, as he said, he wrested from a tomb.'

Other recollections of this time were not so pleasant. Honoré wished to shine in society. No doubt the two "immense and sole desires—to be famous and to be loved"—which haunted him continually, till he at last obtained them at the cost of his life, were already at work within him, and he longed for the tender glances of some charming demoiselle. At any rate he took dancing-lessons, and prepared himself to enter with grace into ladies' society. Here, however, a terrible humiliation awaited him. After all his care and pains, he slipped and fell in the ball-room, and his mortification at the smiles of the women round was so great that he never danced again, but looked on henceforward with the cynicism which he expresses in the "Peau de Chagrin." That wonderful book, side by side with its philosophical teaching, gives a graphic picture of one side of Balzac's restless, feverish youth, as "Louis Lambert" does of his repressed childhood. Neither Louis Lambert nor the morbid and selfish Raphael give, however, the slightest indication of Balzac's most salient characteristic both as boy and youth—the healthy joie de vivre, the gaiety and exuberant merriment, of which his contemporaries speak constantly, and which shone out undimmed even by the wretched health and terrible worries of the last few years of his life. In his books, the bitter and melancholy side of things reigns almost exclusively, and Balzac, using Raphael as his mouthpiece, says: "Women one and all have condemned me. With tears and mortification I bowed before the decision of the world; but my distress was not barren. I determined to revenge myself on society; I would dominate the feminine intellect, and so have the feminine soul at my mercy; all eyes should be fixed upon me, when the servant at the door announced my name. I had determined from my childhood that I would be a great man. I said with André Chénier, as I struck my forehead, 'There is something underneath that!' I felt, I believed, the thought within me that I must express, the system I must establish, the knowledge I must interpret." In another place in the same book the bitterness of his social failure again peeps out: "The incomprehensible bent of women's minds appears to lead them to see nothing but the weak points in a clever man and the strong points of a fool."

Reading these words, we can imagine poor Honoré, a proud, supersensitive boy, leaning against the wall in the ball-room, and watching enviously while agreeable nonentities basked in the smiles he yearned for. It was a hard lot to feel within him the intuitive knowledge of his genius ; to hear the insistent voice of his vocation calling him not to be as ordinary men, but to give his message to the world ; and yet to have the miserable consciousness that no one believed in his talents, and that there was a huge discrepancy between his ambition and his actual attainments.

In 1820 Honoré attained his majority and finished his legal studies. Unfortunately the pecuniary misfortunes which were to haunt all this generation of the Balzac family were beginning—as old M. de Balzac had lost money in two speculations, and now at the age of seventy-four was put on the retired list, a change which meant a considerable diminution of income. He therefore explained to his son—Madame Surville tells us—that M. Passez, to whom he had formerly been of service, had in gratitude offered to take Honoré into his office, and at the end of a few years would leave him his business, when, with the additional arrangement of a rich marriage, a prosperous future would be assured to him. Old M. de Balzac did not specify the nature of the service which was to meet with so rich a reward ; and as he was a gentleman with a distinct liking for talking of his own doings, we may amuse ourselves by supposing that it had to do with those Red Republican days which he was not fond of recalling.

Great was Honoré's consternation at this news. In the first place, owing to M. de Balzac's constant vapourings about the enormous wealth he would leave to his children, it is doubtful whether Honoré, who was probably not admitted to his parents' confidence, had realised up to this time that he would have to earn his own living. Then, if it were necessary for him to work for his bread, he now knew enough of the routine of a lawyer's office to look with horror on the prospect of drawing up wills, deeds of sale, and marriage settlements for the rest of his life. He never forgave the legal profession the shock and the terror he experienced at this time, and his portraits of lawyers, with some notable exceptions, are marked by decided animus. For instance, in "Les Français peints par eux-mêmes," edited by Cunmer, the notary, as described by Balzac, has a flat, expressionless face and wears a mask of bland silliness; and in "Paméla Giraud" one of the characters remarks, "A lawyer who talks to himself—that reminds me of a pastrycook who eats his own cakes." It was rather unfair to decry all lawyers, because of the deadly fear he felt at the prospect of being forced into their ranks, as there is little doubt that he would have shrunk with like abhorrence from any business proposed to him. His childish longing for fame had developed and taken shape, and for him, if he lacked genius, there was no alternative but the dragging out of a worthless and wearying existence. Conscious of his powers, it was a time of struggle, of passionate endeavour, possibly of bewilderment; with the one great determination standing firm in the midst of a chaos of doubt and difficulty—the determination to persevere, and to become a writer at any cost.

He therefore, to his father's consternation, announced his objection to following a legal career, and begged to be allowed an opportunity of proving his literary powers. Thereupon there were lively discussions in the family; but at last the kindly M. de Balzac, apparently against his wife's wishes, yielded to his son's earnest entreaties, and allowed him two years in which to try his fortune as a writer. The friends of the family were loud in their exclamations of disapproval at the folly of this proceeding, which would, they said, waste two of the best years of Honoré's life. As far as they could see, he possessed no genius; and even if he were to succeed in a literary career, he would certainly not gain a fortune, which after all was the principal thing to be considered. However, either the strenuousness and force of Honoré's arguments, or the softness of his father's heart, prevailed in his favour; and in spite of the opposition of the whole of his little world, he was allowed to have his own way, and to make trial of his powers. The rest of the family retired to Villeparisis, about sixteen miles from Paris, and he was established in a small attic at No. 9, Rue Lesdiguières, which was chosen by him for its nearness to the Bibliothèque de l'Arsenal, the only public library of which the contents were unknown to him. At the same time, appearances, always all-important in the Balzac family, were observed, by the fiction that Honoré was at Alby, on a visit to a cousin; and in this way his literary venture was kept secret, in case it proved unsuccessful.

Having arranged this, and asserted himself to the extent of insisting that his son should be allowed a certain amount of freedom in choosing his career, even if he fixed on a course which seemed suicidal, old M. de Balzac appears to have retired from the direction of affairs, and to have left his energetic wife to follow her own will about details. There was no doubt in that lady's mind as to the methods to be pursued. Her husband had been culpably weak, and had allowed himself to be swayed by the freak of a boy who hated work and wanted an excuse for idleness. Honoré must be brought to reason, and be taught that "the way of transgressors is hard," and that people who refuse to take their fair share of life's labour must of necessity suffer from deprivation of their butter, if not of their bread. Her husband was an old man, and had lost money, and it was most exasperating that Honoré should refuse a splendid chance of securing his own future, and one which would most probably never occur again. To a good business woman, who did not naturally share in the boundless optimistic views of M. de Balzac for the future, the crass folly of yielding to the wishes of a boy who could not possibly know what was best for him, was glaringly apparent. However, being a practical woman, when she had done her duty in making the household—except the placid

M. de Balzac—thoroughly uncomfortable, and had most probably driven Honoré almost wild with suppressed irritation, she embarked on the plan of campaign which was to bring the culprit back, repentant and submissive, to the lawyer's desk.

To accomplish this as quickly as possible, it was necessary to make him extremely uncomfortable; so having furnished his attic with the barest necessities—a bed, a table, and a few chairs—she gave him such a scanty allowance that he would have starved if an old woman, la mère Comin, whom he termed his Iris, had not been told to go occasionally to look after him. In spite of the gaiety of Balzac's letters from his garret, the hardships he went through were terrible, and in later years he could not speak of his sufferings at this time without tears coming to his eyes. Apparently he could not even afford to have a fire; and the attic was extremely draughty, blasts coming from the door and window; so that in a letter to his sister he begs her, when sending the coverlet for which he has already asked, to let him have a very old shawl, which he can wear at night. His legs, where he feels the cold most, are wrapped in an ancient coat made by a small tailor of Tours, who to his disgust used to alter his father's garments to fit him, and was a dreadful bungler; but the upper half of his body is only protected by the roof and a flannel waistcoat from the frost, and he needs a shawl badly. He also hopes for a Dantesque cap, the kind his mother always makes for him; and this pattern of cap from the hands of Madame de Balzac figures in the accounts of his attire later on in his life. It is not surprising that he has a cold, and later on a terrible toothache; but it is astonishing that, in spite of cold, hunger, and discomfort, he preserves his gaiety, pluck, and power of making light of hardships, traits of character which were to be strikingly salient all through his hard, fatiguing career. In spite of the misery of his surroundings, he had many compensations. He had gained the wish of his heart, life was before him, beautiful dreams of future fame floated in the air, and at present he had no hateful burden of debt to weigh him down. Therefore he managed to ignore to a great extent the physical pain and discomfort he went through, as he ignored them all through his life, except when ill health interfered with the accomplishment of his work.

Another characteristic which might also be amazing, did we not meet it constantly in Balzac's life, is his longing for luxury and beauty, and his extraordinary faculty for embarking in a perfectly business-like way on wildly unreasonable schemes. With hardly enough money to provide himself with scanty meals, he intends to economise, in order to buy a piano. "The garret is not big enough to hold one," as he casually remarks; but this fact, which, apart from the starving process necessary in order to obtain funds, would appear to the ordinary mind an insurmountable obstacle to the project, does not daunt the ever-hopeful Honoré.

despair about his pecuniary circumstances at the beginning of a letter, talks airily towards the end of buying a costly picture, or acquiring an estate in the country.

There is a curious and striking contrast in Balzac between the backwardness in the expression of his literary genius, and the early development and crystallisation of his character and powers of mind in other directions. Even when he realised his vocation, forsook verse, and began to write novels, he for long gave no indication of his future powers; while, on the other hand, at the age of twenty, his views on most points were formed, and his judgments matured. Therefore, unlike most men, in whom, even if there be no violent changes, age gradually and imperceptibly modifies the point of view, Balzac, a youth in his garret, differed little in essentials from Balzac at forty-five or fifty, a man of world-wide celebrity. He never appears to have passed through those phases of belief and unbelief—those wild enthusiasms, to be rejected later in life—which generally fall to the lot of young men of talent. Perhaps his reasoning and reflective powers were developed unusually early, so that he sowed his mental wild oats in his boyhood. At any rate, in his garret in 1819 he was the same Balzac that we know in later life. Large-minded and far-seeing—except about his business concerns—he was from his youth a voyant, who discerned with extraordinary acuteness the trend of political events; and with an intense respect for authority, he was yet independent, and essentially a strong man.

This absolute stability—a fact Balzac often comments on—is very remarkable, especially as his was a life full of variety, during which he was brought into contact with many influences. He studied the men around him, and gauged their characters—though it must be allowed that he did not make very good practical use of his knowledge; but owing to his strength and breadth of vision, he was himself in all essentials immovable.

The same ambitions, desires, and opinions can be traced all through his career. The wish to enter political life, which haunted him always, was already beginning to stir in 1819, when he wrote at the time of the elections to a friend, M. Théodore Dablin, that he dreamt of nothing but him and the deputies; and his last book, "L'Envers de l'Histoire contemporaine," accentuated, if possible more than any work that had preceded it, the extreme Royalist principles which he showed in his garret play, the ill-fated "Cromwell."

He never swerved from the two great ambitions of his life—to be loved, and to be famous. He was faithful in his friendships; and when once he had stant even to his failures. He began his literary career by writing a play, and all through his life the idea of making his fortune by means of a successful drama recurred to him constantly. Several times he went through that most trying of experiences, a failure which only just missed being a brilliant success, and once this affected him so much that he became seriously ill; but, with his usual spirit and courage, he tried again and again. His friend Théophile Gautier, writing of him in La Presse of September 30th, 1843, after the failure of "Paméla Giraud," said truly that Balzac intended to go on writing plays, even if he had to get through a hundred acts before he could find his proper form.

One part of Balzac never grew up—he was all his life the "child-man" his sister calls him. After nights without sleep he would come out of his solitude with laughter, joy, and excitement to show a new masterpiece; and this was always more wonderful than anything which had preceded it. He was more of a child than his nieces, Madame Surville tells us: "laughed at puns, envied the lucky being who had the 'gift' of making them, tried to do so himself, and failed, saying regretfully, 'No, that doesn't make a pun.' He used to cite with satisfaction the only two he had ever made, 'and not much of a success either,' he avowed in all humility, 'for I didn't know I was making them,' and we even suspected him of embellishing them afterwards."* He was delightfully simple, even to the end of his life. In 1849 he wrote from Russia, where he was confined to his room with illness, to describe minutely a beautiful new dressing-gown in which he marched about the room like a sultan, and was possessed with one of those delightful joys which we only have at eighteen. "I am writing to you now in my termolana,"† he adds for the satisfaction of his correspondent.

We must now return to Honoré in his attic, where, as in later years, he drank much coffee, and was unable to resist the passion for fruit which was always his one gourmandise. He records one day that he has eaten two melons, and must pay for the extravagance with a diet of dry bread and nuts, but contemplates further starvation to pay for a seat to see Talma in "Cinna."

He writes to his sister: "I feel to-day that riches do not make happiness, and that the time I shall pass here will be to me a source of pleasant memories. To live according to my fancy; to work as I wish and in my own way; to do nothing if I wish it; to dream of a beautiful future; to think of

* "Balzac, sa Vie et ses Œuvres, d'après sa Correspondance," by Madame L. Surville (née de Balzac).

† "H. de Balzac—Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 418.

Père-Lachaise was a favourite resort when he was not working very hard; and it was from there that he obtained his finest inspirations, and decided that, of all the feelings of the soul, sorrow is the most difficult to express, because of its simplicity. Curiously enough, he abandoned the Jardin des Plantes because he thought it melancholy, and apparently found his reflections among the tombs more cheerful. He decided that the only beautiful epitaphs are single names—such as La Fontaine, Masséna, Molière, "which tell all, and make one dream."

When he returned home to his garret, fresh interests awaited him. Sometimes, he tells us in the "Peau de Chagrin," he would "study the mosses, with their colours revived by showers, or transformed by the sun into a brown velvet that fitfully caught the light. Such things as these formed my recreations: the passing poetic moods of daylight, the melancholy mists, sudden gleams of sunlight, the silence and the magic of night, the mysteries of dawn, the smoke-wreaths from each chimney; every chance event, in fact, in my curious world became familiar to me."

Occasionally on Sundays he would go to a friend's house, ostensibly to play cards—a pastime which he hated. He generally, however, managed to escape from the eye of his hostess; and comfortably ensconced in a window behind thick curtains, or hidden behind a high armchair, he would pour into the ear of a congenial companion some of the thoughts which surged through his impetuous brain. All his life he needed this outlet after concentrated mental labour; and sometimes in a friend's drawing-room, if he knew himself to be surrounded only by intimates, he would give full vent to his conversational powers. On these occasions he would carry his hearers away with him, often against their better judgment, by his eloquence and verve; would send them into fits of hearty laughter by his sallies, his store of droll anecdotes, his jollity and gaiety; and would display his consummate gifts as a dramatic raconteur. Later in life, after he had raised the enmity of a large section of the writing world, and knew that there were many watching eagerly to immortalise in print—with gay malice and wit on the surface, and bitter spite and hatred below—the heedless and possibly arrogant words their enemy had uttered in moments of excitement and expansion, he grew cautious; and sometimes because of this, and sometimes because he was collecting material for his work, he would often be silent in general society. To the end, however, he loved a tête-à-tête with a sympathetic listener—one, it must be conceded, who would be content, except for occasional comment, nearer, with what satisfaction special tit-bits of gossip were reserved to be talked over and explained during the long evenings at Wierzchownia! How he loved to rush in to his sister with the latest news of the personages of his novels, as well as with brilliant plans to improve his general prospects; and with what enthusiasm he poured out to Théophile Gautier, or even to Léon Gozlan, his confidences of all sorts! Plans, absurd and impossible, but worked out with a business-like arrangement of detail which, when mingled with somnambulists and magnetisers, had a weird yet apparently fascinating effect on his hearers; magnificent diatribes against the wickedness of his special enemies, journalists, editors, and the Press in general; strange fancies to do with the world where Eugénie Grandet or Le Père Goriot had their dwelling,—all these ideas, opinions, and feelings came from his lips with an eloquence, a force, and a life which were all convincing. Yet by a strange anomaly, which is sometimes seen in talkative and apparently unreserved people, Balzac in reality revealed very little of himself—in fact, we may often suspect him of using a flow of apparently spontaneous words as a screen to mask some hidden feeling. Therefore, when people who had considered themselves his intimate friends tried to write about him after his death, they found that they really knew little of the essentials of the man, and could only string together amusing anecdotes, proving him to have been eccentric, amusing, and essentially bon camarade, but giving little idea of his real personality and genius.

* "Correspondance," vol. i.

Even in these early days at the card-parties—where sometimes the hostess noticed the defection of the two young guests, and, holding a card in each white delicate hand, would beckon them to take their place at the game, which they would do with humble and discomfited faces, like schoolboys surprised at a forbidden amusement—M. de Petigny, Balzac's companion, must have been struck by his openness in some respects and the absolute mystery with which he surrounded himself in others. Where he lived, what he was doing, what his life was like—all these facts were hidden from his companion, till he revealed himself at last, on the verge of his hoped-for triumph. But, on the other hand, the sentiments and impressions of which M. de Petigny read afterwards in Balzac's books seemed to him only a pale, distant echo of the rich and vivid expressions which fell from his lips in these intimate talks. Magnetism, in which he had a strong faith all his life, was exercising his thoughts greatly. It was "the irresistible ascendency of mind begun to occupy his fixed position in life, and was on the threshold of a millennium.

Balzac's glimpses of society were, however, rare, and ceased altogether during the last few months of his stay in the Rue Lesdiguières. However, other more satisfying pleasures were his: "Unspeakable joys are showered on us by the exertion of our mental faculties; the quest of ideas, and the tranquil contemplation of knowledge; delights indescribable, because purely intellectual and impalpable to our senses. So we are obliged to use material terms to express the mysteries of the soul. The pleasure of striking out in some lonely lake of clear water, with forests, rocks, and flowers around, and the soft stirring of the warm breeze—all this would give to those who knew them not a very faint idea of the exultation with which my soul bathed itself in the beams of an unknown light, hearkened to the awful and uncertain voice of inspiration, as vision upon vision poured from some unknown source through my throbbing brain." †

There was another side to the picture, and perhaps in this description, written in 1830, Balzac has slightly antedated his joy in his creative

* Article by M. Jules de Petigny.

† "La Peau de Chagrin," by Honoré de Balzac.

rs, and describes more correctly his feelings he wrote "Les Chouans," "La Maison du -qui-pelote," and the "Peau de Chagrin" than those of this earlier period of his life,
the difficulties of expressing himself often ed insurmountable, and the hiatus between his and the form in which to clothe them was st impossible to bridge over.

iting did not at any time come easily to him,
"Stella" and "Coqsigrue," his first novels, never finished; while a comedy, "Les Deux sophes," was also abandoned in despair. Next et to work at "Cromwell," a tragedy in five which was to be his passport to fame. At play he laboured for months, shutting himself mpletely, and loving his self-imposed slavery—gh his want of faculty for versification, and the se difficulty he experienced in finding words he ideas which crowded into his imaginative , were decided drawbacks. While engaged on work, he may indeed have experienced some ie feelings he describes in the "Peau de grin," quoted above; for, curiously enough, mwell," his first finished production, was the one of his early works about which he was ved, and which he imagined to be a chef vre. It was well he had this happy faith to in him, as, according to the account of M. Jules Petigny, the circumstances under which the was composed must, to put the matter mildly, been distinctly depressing.

jug of lemonade, a glass, and a morsel of bread. The heat in this wretched hole was stifling, and one breathed a mephitic air which would have given cholera, if cholera had then been invented!" Balzac was in bed, with a cotton cap of problematic colour on his head. "You see," he said, "the abode I have not left except once for two months—the evening when you met me. During all this time I have not got up from the bed where I work at the great work, for the sake of which I have condemned myself to this hermit's life, and which happily I have just finished, for my powers have come to an end." It must have been during these last months in his garret, when he neglected everything for his projected masterpiece, that, covered with vermin from the dirt of his room, he would creep out in the evening to buy a candle, which, as he possessed no candlestick, he would put in an empty bottle.

The almost insane ardour for and absorption in his work, which were his salient characteristics, had already possession of him; and we see that he laboured as passionately now for fame and for love of his art, as he did later on, when the struggle to free himself from debt, and to gain a home and womanly companionship were additional incentives to effort. At the time of which M. de Petigny speaks, however, his troubles appeared to be over, as the masterpiece for which he had suffered so much was completed ; and joyfully confident that triumph awaited him, Honoré took it home with him to Villeparisis at the end of April, 1820. He was so certain, poor fellow, of success, that he had specially begged that among those invited to the reading of the tragedy, should be the insulting person who told his father fifteen months before, that he was fit for nothing but a post as copying clerk.

CHAPTER IV

1820—1828

Reading of "Cromwell"—Balzac is obliged to live at home—Unhappiness—Writes romantic novels—Friendship with Madame de Berny—Starts in Paris as publisher and afterwards as printer—Impending bankruptcy only prevented by help from his parents and Madame de Berny.

EVIDENTLY Balzac's happy faith in the beauty of "Cromwell" had impressed his parents, as, apparently without having seen the play, they had assembled a large concourse of friends for the reading; and between happy pride in his boy's genius, and satisfaction at his own acuteness in discerning it, old M. de Balzac was no doubt nearly as joyous as Honoré himself. The Balzac family were prepared for triumph, the friends were amused or incredulous, and the solemn trial began.* The tragedy, strongly Royalist in principles, opens, according to the plot as given by Balzac in a letter to his sister,† with the entrance of Queen Henrietta Maria into Westminster. She is utterly exhausted, and, disguised in humble garments, has returned from taking her children for safety into Holland, and from begging for the help of the King of France.

* The original MS., beautifully written out, and tied with faded blue ribbon, is in the possession of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

† "Honoré de Balzac—Correspondance," vol. i. p. 28.

afford, in tears, tells her of late events, and of the ng's imprisonment and future trial; but during s conversation Cromwell and Ireton enter, and Queen, in terror, hides behind a tomb, till, rified at the discussion as to whether or no the g shall be put to death, she comes out, and, as lzac remarks, "makes them a famous discourse."
t II. sounds a little dull, though no doubt it is hly instructive, as a great part of it is taken up h a monologue by the King detailing the events is past reign. Later on Charles, instead of keep-Cromwell's son who has fallen into his hands, hostage for his own life, gives him up to his ner without condition; but Cromwell, unmoved this generosity, still plots for his King's death.
fifth Act, which Balzac remarks is the most ficult of all, opens with a scene in which the King s the Queen his last wishes, which Balzac erpolates with (Quelle scène!); then Strafford orms the King of his condemnation (Quelle ne!); the King and the Queen say good-bye—uelle scène!) again; and the play ends with the een vowing eternal vengeance upon England, laring that enemies will rise everywhere against
, and that one day France will fight against her,
quer her, and crush her.

Honoré began his reading with the utmost husiasm, modulating his sonorous voice to suit different characters, and even contriving for a e to impart by his expressive reading a fictitious erest to the dull, tedious tragedy. Gradually, his heart, and knew that he had not triumphed after all. Nevertheless, he very naturally rebelled against the strongly expressed adverse judgment of his enemy of the copying-clerk proposal, and begged to be allowed to appeal to a competent and impartial critic. To this request his father assented, and M. Surville, who was now engaged to Laure, proposed that M. Andrieux, of the Académie Française, formerly his own master at the École Polytechnique, should be asked to give an opinion. Honoré, his sister says, "accepted this literary elder as sovereign judge," no doubt hoping against hope that a really cultured man would see those beauties which were unfortunately hidden from the eyes of the unintellectual inhabitants of Villeparisis. However, the verdict of M. Andrieux was, if possible, more crushing than any of the events which had preceded it. In the honest opinion of this expert, the author of "Cromwell" ought to do anything, no matter what, except literature.

Honoré had asked for an impartial judgment, and had promised to abide by it. His discomfiture and sense of failure ought therefore to have been complete. Genius does not, however, follow the ary road; and with the mixture of pluck, dence in himself, and pride which always cterised him, Honoré did not allow that he beaten, and would not show the feelings of and disappointment which must have filled eart. "Tragedies are not my line"—that is e said; and if he had been allowed to follow wn bent, he would at once have returned garret, and have begun to write again with ted ardour.

turally, however, the Balzac family refused low him to continue the course of senseless which was already beginning to ruin his n. Madame de Balzac was specially strong on oint; and though he had only been allowed n months, instead of the two years promised s trial, she insisted that he should come home nce, and remain under the maternal eye. d, this seemed quite necessary, after the ions he had gone through. His sufferings made him thin at any period of his life; but his face was pale and his eyes hollow, and his ng friend, Dr. Nacquart, sent him at once to t in the air of his native Touraine.

ter this followed a time of bitter trial for poor ré. His sister Laure married M. Surville in 1820, about a month after his return home, ent to live at Bayeux, so that he was deprived r congenial companionship; and, in spite of n and buoyancy, his letters to her show his me wretchedness. Years afterwards he told dreams of future fame vanish like smoke, and the hated lawyer's office become a certainty, if he failed to make money by writing. In deadly fear of this, and with the paralysing consciousness that his present circumstances were peculiarly unpropitious as a literary education, he rebelled against the hard fate which denied him opportunity to work for fame. "Laure, Laure," he cries at this time, "my two only and immense desires —to be loved and to be celebrated—will they ever be satisfied?"

Whatever his aspirations might be, it was necessary that he should do something to support himself, as his parents firmly refused to grant him the 1,500 francs—about £60—a year for which he begged, to enable him to live in Paris and to carry out his vocation. He was therefore obliged to write at his home at Villeparisis in the midst of distractions and discouragements. In these unpropitious circumstances he produced in five years—with different collaborators, whose names are now rescued from absolute oblivion by their transitory connection with him—eight novels in thirty-one volumes. That he managed to find a publisher for most of these novels, and to make

), £60, or £80 out of each, is, according to sister, a remarkable proof of his strength of l, and also of his power of fascination. The ment generally took the form of a bill payable some distant period—a form of receiving money ich does not seem very satisfying; but at any e Balzac could prove to his family that he was ning something, and was himself cheered by small successes. We can imagine his feverish iety, and the cunning with which he would rt every wile to induce the publisher—himself truggling man—to accept his wares, when he w that a refusal would mean mingled scoffs and entations at home, and possibly a menace that much longer leisure would be allowed him for ng. There is pathos in the fate of one whose ius is unrecognised till his day on earth is over, far harder seems the lot of the man who longs l struggles, feeling that the power is in him, and o yet, by some strange gulf between thought and pression, can only produce what he knows to be rthless. It speaks much for Balzac's courage, ience, and determination, or perhaps for the uitive force of a genius which refused to be nied outlet, that he struggled through this weary ne, and in spite of opposition kept to his fixed rpose of becoming a writer.

These early works—"L'Héritière de Birague," ean-Louis," "Le Centenaire," "Le Vicaire des dennes," "La Dernière Fée," "Wann Chlore," l others, published in 1822 and the three these youthful attempts are certainly not worthy of the great man who wrote them, and he consistently refused to acknowledge their authorship. The two first, "L'Héritière de Birague" and "Jean-Louis," were written with the collaboration of M. Auguste le Poitevin de l'Egreville, who took the name of Viellerglé, while Balzac adopted that of Lord R'hoone, an anagram of Honoré, so that these two novels are signed with both pseudonyms.* It is amusing to find that the sage Honoré, in 1820, prudently discourages a passing fancy on the part of his sister Laurence for his collaborator, by remarking that writers are very bad partis, though he hastens to add that he only means this from a pecuniary point of view! Laure, at Bayeux, is made useful as an amateur advertising agent, and is carefully told that, though she is to talk about the novels a great deal, she is never to lend her copies to any one, because people must buy the books to read them. "L'Héritière" brought in about £32, and "Jean-Louis" £53, unfortunately both in bills at long date; but it was the first money Honoré had ever earned, and he was

* See "Une Page perdue de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

turally excited. However, with "La Dernière e" he was not so fortunate, as both versions—one hich appeared in 1823 and the other in 1824—re published at his own cost. Nevertheless, he s no illusions about the worth of his books, L'Héritière" being, he says, a "véritable cochonie littéraire," while "Jean-Louis" has "several her funny jokes, and some not bad attempts character, but a detestable plot."

In the same year, 1822, he writes one of his droll, seeching letters to beg M. and Mme. Surville help him out of a great difficulty, and to write e volume of "Le Vicaire des Ardennes" while writes the other, and afterwards fits the two gether. The matter is most important, as he has omised Pollet to have two novels, "Le Vicaire" d "Le Savant"—the latter we never hear of ain—ready by October 1st. It is necessary be specially quick about "Le Vicaire," partly ause Auguste, his collaborator, is writing a vel of the same name, and Balzac's production ust come out first, and also for the joyful reason at he will actually receive £24 in ready money the two books, the further £56 following in ls payable at eight months. What do the Sur-les think about it? He throws himself on their erosity, though he is afraid Laure will never anage to write sixty pages of a novel every day.
pparently the Survilles, or at least M. Surville—r it is certain that the devoted Laure would have orked herself to death to help Honoré—did not want of help prevented the carrying out of the contract, and was the reason that the world has not been enriched by the appearance of "Le Savant." Honoré, however, judging by his next letter, did not bear malice: he was accustomed to make continual requests, reasonable and sometimes very unreasonable, to his family; and the large good-humour which was one of the foundations of his robust character, prevented him from showing any irritation when they were refused.

From 1821 to 1824 he wrote thirty-one volumes, and it is an extraordinary proof of his versatility, that in 1824, in the midst of the production of these romantic novels, he published a pamphlet entitled "Du Droit d'Aînesse" which argues with singular force, logic, and erudition against the revolutionary and Napoleonic theories on the division of property; and a small volume entitled "Histoire impartiale des Jésuites," which is an impassioned defence of religion and the monarchy. "The Bourbons are the preservers of the sublime religion of Christ, and they have never betrayed the trust which confided Christianity to them," he cries. No one reading these political essays would think it likely that they were the work of the romantic writer of "La Dernière Fée" or "Argow rate," which were employing Balzac's pen at me time.

ng men are often very severe critics of the of their family; and Balzac, cursed with nsitiveness of genius, and smarting under the disappointment of disillusionment and of ted and compressed powers, was not likely to indulgent critic; but making due allowance ese facts, it does not appear that his home particularly comfortable place at this time.
I. de Balzac was as placid as an Egyptian id and perennially cheerful; but the restless me de Balzac was now following in the foot-of her nervous mother and becoming a malade naire. This did not add to the comfort of mily, while the small excitements she roused tually were peculiarly trying to her eldest son, was himself not of a placid nature.

wever, there were compensations, though the et Honoré does not mention these in his to Laure, as in 1821 his friendship with me de Berny began, and only ceased in 1836 her death, which, in spite of his affection for me Hanska, was a lifelong sorrow to him.
of Honoré's home duties was to act as tutor younger brother Henry—the spoilt child of mily—who, owing to supposed delicacy, was ted at home; and as the Bernys lived near arisis, it was arranged that he should at the time give lessons to one of M. and Madame rny's boys. This may have helped to bring and divided their time between the village of Saint-Firmin, near Chantilly, and Paris; and Balzac occasionally paid them visits in the country, and saw Madame de Berny continually in Paris. She was twenty-two years older than Honoré, and no doubt supplied the element of motherliness which was conspicuously absent in Madame de Balzac.

She is a gentle and pathetic figure, the woman who understood Balzac as Madame Hanska did not; who made light of her troubles and sufferings for fear of grieving him in the midst of his own struggles; and who, while performing her duties conscientiously as devoted wife and mother, for twelve years gave up two hours every day to his society. She lent him money, interceded with his parents on his behalf, corrected his proofs, acted as a severe and candid though sympathetic critic, and above all cheered and encouraged him, and prevented him from committing suicide in his dark days of distress. On the other hand, the friendship of a man like Balzac must have been of absorbing interest to a woman of great delicacy of feeling, and evidently considerable literary powers, whose surroundings were uncongenial; and his warm and enduring affection helped her to tide over many of the troubles of a sad life.

Recent researches have discovered several interng facts about the origin of the woman to om may be ascribed the merit of "creating" the ter who was destined to exercise so great an uence on his own and succeeding generations.* iously enough, Louise Antoinette Laure nner, destined at the age of fifteen years and months to become Madame de Berny, was, like dame Hanska, a foreigner, being the daughter Joseph Hinner, a German musician, who was ught by Turgot to France. Here he became pist to Marie Antoinette, and married Madame lpée de Laborde, one of the Queen's ladies in ting. Two years later, on May 23rd, 1777, the ure Madame de Berny came into the world, and de her début with a great flourish of trumpets, uis XVI. and Marie Antoinette, represented by Duc de Fronsac and Laure Auguste de Fitznes, Princesse de Chimay, being her god-parents. nen in 1784 her father died, her mother married Chevalier de Jarjayes, one of Marie Antoinette's st loyal adherents during the Revolution. It s he who conceived the project of carrying off uis XVII. from the Temple, and who was rusted with the precious duty of carrying the l, ring, and hair belonging to the Royal Family the exiled Monsieur and Comte d'Artois.*

We can easily see whence Balzac derived his ong Royalist principles—how from boyhood the living, had passed her time in the disturbed and exciting atmosphere of plots and counterplots; and she herself could tell him story after story of heart-rending tragedies and of hairbreadth escapes, which had happened to her own relations and friends. From her he acquired those aristocratic longings which always characterised him, and through her influence he made acquaintance with several people of high position and importance, and thus was enabled to make an occasional appearance in the beau-monde of Paris.

* See "Balzac, Imprimeur," in "La Jeunesse de Balzac," by . Hanotaux et Vicaire.

Her portrait gives the idea of an elegant rather than pretty woman, with a long neck, sloping shoulders, black curls on the temples, at each side of a high forehead, and large, languishing dark eyes, under pencilled eyebrows. The oval face has a character of gentle melancholy, and there is something subdued and suffering in the whole expression which invites our pity. She wears in the portrait an Empire dress, confined under the arms by a yellow ribbon.

"La dilecta," as Balzac calls her, cannot have been a very happy woman. Of her nine children, watched with the most tender solicitude, only four lived to grow up; and of these her favourite son, "beautiful as the day, like her tender and spiritual, like her full of noble sentiments," as Balzac says, died he year before her; and only an insane daughter nd a wild, unsatisfactory son survived her. This errible blow broke her heart, and she shut herself p and refused to see even Balzac during the last ear of her life. The end must at any rate have been peaceful, as, in order to prolong her existence s much as possible, it had been found necessary to eparate her from the irritable husband with whose agaries she had borne patiently during thirty tedious ears; but perhaps she was sorry in the end that his was necessary. Madame de Mortsauf, in the Lys dans la Vallée," is intended to be a portrait of er, though Balzac says that he has only managed o give a faint reflection of her perfections. However this may be, Henriette de Mortsauf is a harming and ethereal creation, and from her we an understand the fascination Madame de Berny xerted over Balzac, and can realise that, as he ays to Madame Hanska, her loss could never be nade up to him. It is possible also to sympathise vith the feeling, perhaps unacknowledged even to imself, which peeps out in a letter to Madame Hanska in 1840.* In this he reproaches his correspondent for her littleness in not writing to him ecause he cannot answer her letters quickly, and ells her that he has lately been in such straits that e has not been able to pay for franking his letters, nd has several times eaten a roll on the Boulevards or his dinner. He goes on: "Ah! I implore you, lo not make comparisons between yourself and history, except that he passed the time at home, and was presumably working hard at his romantic novels ; but in 1824 a change came, one no doubt hailed at the time with eager delight, though it proved unfortunately to be the foundation of all his subsequent misfortunes.

* "Lettres à L'Étrangère."

When he went up to Paris to make arrangements for publishing his novels, he stayed in the old lodgings of his family in the Rue du Roi Doré, and here he often met a friend, M. d'Assonvillez, to whom he confided his fear of being forced into an occupation distasteful to him. M. d'Assonvillez was sympathetic, advised him to seek for a business which would make him independent, and, carried away by Honoré's powers of persuasion and eloquence, actually promised to provide the necessary funds. We can imagine Balzac's joy at this offer, and the enthusiasm with which he would take up his abode in Paris, and feel that he was about to earn his living, nay, more, that he would no doubt become enormously rich, and would then have leisure to give up his time to literature. What however decided him to become first publisher and then printer we do not know. He started his publishing campaign with the idea of bringing out compact editions of the complete works of different authors in one volume, and began with Molière and La Fontaine, carrying on the two publications at the same time, for fear of competition if his secret hould be discovered. The idea, which had already een thought of by Urbain Canel, was a good one; but unfortunately Balzac was not able to obtain support from the trade, and had not sufficient apital for advertising. Therefore by the end of he year not twenty copies were sold, and he lost 15,000 francs on this affair alone. Consequently, in rder to save the rent of the warehouse in which the books were stored, he was obliged to part with all the precious compact editions for the price by weight of the paper on which they were printed.

Matters now looked very black, as Balzac owed about 70,000 francs; but M. d'Assonvillez was vidently much impressed by his business capacity, and was naturally anxious to be repaid the money he had lent. He therefore introduced Honoré to a relation who was making a large fortune by his printing-press; and Balzac, full of enthusiasm, dreamt of becoming a second Richardson, and of combining the occupations of author and printer. His father was persuaded to provide he necessary funds, and handed him over 30,000 francs—about £1,200—with which to start the enterprise. In August, 1826, Balzac began again joyously, first by himself and afterwards with a partner named Barbier, whom he had noticed as a bonus of 12,000 francs, and 10,000 more

been spent on the necessary materials, there remained very little capital with which to meet the current expenses of the undertaking. Nevertheless, the young partners started full of hope, having bought from Laurent for 30,000 francs the premises at No. 7, Rue des Marais Saint-Germain, now the Rue Visconti, a street so narrow that two vehicles cannot pass in it. A wooden staircase with an iron handrail led from a dark passage to the large barrack-like hall they occupied: an abode which Balzac tried to beautify, possibly for Madame de Berny's visits, by hangings of blue calico.

There Balzac developed quickly. He learnt the struggle of a business life, the duel between man and man, through which thousands pass without gaining anything except business acuteness, but which introduced the great psychologist to hundreds of new types, and showed to his keen, observant eyes man, not in society or domesticity, but in undress, fighting for life itself, or for all that makes life worth living. In the Rue de Lesdiguières he had struggled with himself, striving in cold and hunger to gain the mastery of his art. Here he battled with others; and since, except on paper, he never possessed business capacity, he ed and went under; but by his defeat he paved way to future triumph. He passed through experience possibly unique in the career of a n of letters, one which imparts the peculiar vour of business, money, and affairs to his ks, and which fixed on him for all his days impression of restless, passionate, thronging manity which he pictures in his books. The ss between his early romantic novels and such ok as the "Peau de Chagrin" is immeasurable, l cannot be altogether accounted for by any ching, however valuable, or even by the strong uence which intercourse with Madame de Berny rcised. Something else definite must have pened to him—some great opening out and elopment, which caused a sudden appearance on surface of hitherto latent, unworkable powers. s forcing-process took place at his first contact h the war of life; and though he bore the scars he encounter as long as he lived, he grew by its h, ferment, and disaster to his full stature. In a Maison du Chat-qui-pelote," "Illusions Per-s," and "César Birotteau" he gives different ses of this life, spent partly in the printer's office partly in the streets, rushing anxiously from e to place and from person to person, trying ly by interviews to avert the impending ruin.

Matters seemed, however, quite hopeless; but en, towards the end of 1827, an opportunity urred of becoming possessed of a type-foundry, partners, perhaps with the desperation of his place. However, even this assistance did not long avert disaster—bankruptcy was impending, and Madame de Berny and Laure implored Madame de Balzac to prevent this. The latter, wishing at all costs to keep the matter from the ears of her husband, now a very old man and failing in health, begged a cousin, M. Sédillot, to come forward, and at least to save the honour of the family. M. Sédillot, who appears to have been a good man of business, at once set gallantly to work to disentangle the embroglio, and to free Honoré from its meshes. As a result of his efforts, the printing-press was sold to M. Laurent, and the type-foundry became the property of the De Bernys, under whom it was highly successful. At the same time, to save Honoré from disgrace, Madame de Balzac lent 37,600 francs and Madame de Berny 45,000, the latter sum being paid back in full by Balzac in 1836, the year of Madame de Berny's death. "Without her I should be dead," he tells Madame Hanska. He was most anxious not to sell the type-foundry, and his parents have been severely criticised for their refusal to provide further funds for the purpose of carrying on that and the printing-office.

This blame seems a little unfair. It is true that, ter Balzac had been obliged, to his intense grief, part with both businesses at a loss, a fortune s made out of the type-foundry alone. But ie Balzacs had lost money, and had their other ildren to provide for; while Honoré, though well quipped with hope, enthusiasm, and belief in mself, had hitherto failed to justify a trust in s business capacities. In fact, if his parents had een endowed with prophetic eyesight, and had een enabled to take a bird's-eye view of their elebrated son's future enterprises, which were ways, according to his own account, destined to il only by some unfortunate slip at the last, it ems doubtful whether they would have been ise to alter the course they adopted.

CHAPTER V

1828—1829

Life in the Rue de Tournon—Privations and despair—Friendships—Auguste Borget—Madame Carraud—The Duchesse d'Abrantès—George Sand, etc.—Balzac writes "La Peau de Chagrin" and the "Physiologie du Mariage"—His right to be entitled "De Balzac."

In September, 1828, before the final winding up of affairs, Balzac had fled from Paris, and had gone to spend three weeks with his friends the Pommereuls in Brittany. There he began to write "Les Chouans," the first novel to which he signed his name. With his usual hopefulness, dreams of future fame filled his brain; and in spite of his misfortunes, his relief at having obtained temporary escape from his difficulties and freedom to pursue his literary career was so great, that his jolly laugh often resounded in the old chateau of Fougères. It was certainly a remarkable case of buoyancy of temperament, as the circumstances in which he found himself were distinctly discouraging. He was now twenty-nine years old; he owed about 100,000 francs, and was utterly penniless; while his reputation for commercial capacity had been completely destroyed. His most pressing liabilities had been paid by his mother, who was all his life one of his principal creditors; and he was now

ly under the yoke of that heavy burden of debt ch was destined never again to be lifted from shoulders. Once again, as they had done nine s before, his parents cast off all responsibility their unsatisfactory son. They had saved the ly honour, which would have been compromised is bankruptcy; but they felt that they had performed their duty, and that whether lived or starved was his own affair. His tion was infinitely worse than it had been in e early days in the Rue Lesdiguières, when nission would have led to reinstatement in ur. He was now, as he graphically expressed it, own into" the Rue de Tournon,* and apparently provision was made for his wants. His parents, had moved from Villeparisis to Versailles the before, in order to be near Madame Surville, ted their interference in his affairs to severe cism on his want of respect in not coming to is family, and righteous wrath at his extravae in hanging his room with blue calico. These oaches he parried with the defence that he no money to pay omnibus fares, and could not write often because of the expense of postage;
e anent the muslin, he stated that he possessed efore his failure, as La Touche and he had d it up to hide a frightful paper on the walls he printing-office. Uncrushed by the scathing ments on his attempts at decoration, curious gh characteristic efforts on the part of a

* He says himself "Rue Cassini," but this is a mistake.

one from Madame Surville, written evidently at the instigation of M. and Mme. de Balzac, to blame his supposed idleness; and the poor fellow, to whom this fault at least could at no time be justly imputed, asks her if he is not already unhappy enough, and tells her pathetically how he suffers from these unjust suspicions, and that he can never be happy till he is dead. In the end, however, he returns with childlike persistence to the screens as a panacea for all his ills, and finishes with: "But my screens—I want them more than ever, for a little joy in the midst of torment!"

He had now apparently completely gone under, like many another promising young man of whom great things are expected; and he had in his pride and misery hidden himself from every one, except a few intimate friends. With the death on June 19th, 1829, of his father, whose last days were saddened by the knowledge of his son's disaster, the world was poorer by one castle in the air the less; for besides his natural sorrow at the death of the kind old man, who was so much softer than his wife, the dream of becoming a millionaire by means of the Tontine capital faded away, like all poor Honoré's other visions.

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 82.

ven Balzac's buoyancy was not always proof against e depressing influence of two or three days of arvation, and he sometimes descended to the lowest epths, and groped in those dark places from which eath seems the only escape. When he tells us in La Peau de Chagrin" that Raphael walked with uncertain step in the Tuileries Gardens, "as if e were in some desert, elbowed by men whom he not see, hearing, through all the voices of the wd, one voice alone, the voice of Death," it is alzac himself, who, after glorious aspirations, after ing in imagination raised to heights to which ly a great nature can aspire, now lay bruised d worsted, a complete failure, and thought that by icide he would at least obtain peace and oblivion.
e knew to the full the truth of his words:
Between a self-sought death and the abundant pes whose voices call a young man to Paris, God ly knows what may intervene, what contending eas have striven within the soul, what poems ve been set aside, what moans and what despair ve been repressed, what abortive masterpieces
d vain endeavours." *

Looking back years afterwards at this terrible ne, he can find only one reason why he did not t an end to himself, and that was the existence Madame de Berny: "She was a mother, a oman friend, a family, a man friend, an adviser," cries enthusiastically; "she made the writer,
e consoled the young man, she formed his taste,

* Honoré de Balzac, "La Peau de Chagrin."

obligations. "Every day with her was a fête," he said to Madame Hanska long afterwards.

About this time another friendship was beginning, which, though slower in growth and not so passionate in character, was as faithful, and was only terminated by Balzac's death. When Madame Surville went to live at Versailles, she was delighted to find that an old schoolfellow, Madame Carraud, was settled there, her husband holding the post of director of the military school at Saint-Cyr. Honoré had known Madame Carraud since 1819; but he first became intimate with her and her husband in 1826, and later he was their constant guest at Angoulême, where Commandant Carraud was in charge of the Government powder-works, or at Frapesle in Berry, where Madame Carraud had a country house. She was a woman of much intelligence and ambition, high-principled and possessing much common sense. Balzac occasionally complained that she was a little wanting in softness; but, nevertheless, he invariably turned to her for comfort in the vicissitudes of his more passionate attachments. He was also much attached to M. Carraud, a man of great scientific attainments and a good husband, but, to his wife's despair, utterly lacking in energy and ambition; so that instead of taking the position to which by his abilities he was entitled, he soon retired altogether from public life, and Madame Carraud, who should, according to Balzac, have found scope for her talents in Paris, was buried in the country. Nevertheless, the Carrauds were a happy couple, genuinely devoted to each other; and Madame Carraud cited the instance of their affection, in spite of the difference of their point of view on many subjects, when in 1833 she wrote to Honoré urging him to marry.* "There is no need to tell you that my husband and I are not sympathetic in everything. We are so unlike each other that the same objects appear quite differently to us. Yet I know the happiness about which I speak. We both feel it in the same degree, though in a different way. I would not give it up for the fullest existence, according to generally received ideas. I have not an empty moment."

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

She was an ardent politician, and we gain much of our knowledge of Balzac's political views from his letters to her when he wished to become a deputy; while she also possessed the faculty which he valued most in his women friends, that of intelligent literary criticism. She could be critical on other points as well; and, like Madame Hanska, blamed Balzac for mobility of ideas and inconstancy of resolution, which she said wasted his intellect. She complained that, in the time that he might have used to bring one plan successfully to completion, he generally started ten or twelve new ones, all of which vanished into smoke, and brought him no advantage.*

* Letter from Madame Carraud in the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul's collection, published in La Revue Bleue, November 21st, 1903.

Hardly a year passed without Balzac spending some time at the hospitable house at Frapesle, the doors of which were always open to him; and there, away from creditors, publishers, journalists, and all his other enemies, he was able to write in peace and quietness. There, too, he made many pleasant acquaintances, among them M. Armand Perémé, the distinguished antiquary, and M. Périollas, who was at one time under M. Carraud at Saint-Cyr, and afterwards became chief of a squadron of artillery. To Madame Carraud he also owed an introduction to his most intimate male friend, Auguste Borget, a genre painter who travelled in China, and drew many pictures of the scenery there. Borget lodged in the same house with Balzac in the Rue Cassini, and is mentioned by him in a letter to Madame Hanska, in 1833, as one of his three real friends beside her and his sister, Madame de Berny and Madame Carraud being the other two. It was a very real grief to Balzac when Borget was away; and he says that even when the painter is travelling, sketching, and never writes to him, he is constantly in his remembrance; while in another letter he speaks of his friend's nobility of soul and beauty of sentiment.

* "L'École des Ménages" in "Autour de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

To Borget was dedicated the touching story of "La Messe de l'Athée"; and in case of Balzac's sudden death it was to this "good, old, and true friend" that the duty of burning Madame Hanska's letters was entrusted, though eventually their recipient performed this painful task himself in 1847.

A still older friend was M. Dablin, a rich, retired ironmonger with artistic tastes, who left his valuable collection of artistic objects to the Louvre. He was known to Balzac before 1817; and in 1830 the successful writer remembers with gratitude that M. Dablin used to be his only visitor during his martyrdom in the Rue Lesdiguières in 1819. At that time and later he was most generous in lending Honoré money; and the only cloud that came between them for a long time was his indignation when Balzac wished to find him further security than his own life for a loan he had promised. Later on, in 1845, when M. Dablin, rather hurt by some heedless words from Balzac, and evidently jealous of his former protégé's grand acquaintances, complained that honours and fortune changed people's hearts—the great novelist found time, after his daily sixteen hours of work, to write a long letter to his old benefactor.* In this he tells him that nothing will alter his affection for him, that all his real friends are equal in his sight; and he makes the true boast that, though he may have the egotism of the hard worker, he has never yet forsaken any one for whom he feels affection, and is the same now in heart as when he was a boy.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 115.

Other early and lifelong friendships were with Madame Delannoy, who lent him money, and was in all ways kind to him, and with M. de Margonne, who lived at Saché, a chateau on the Indre, in the beautiful Touraine valley described in "Le Lys dans la Vallée," and who had held Balzac on his knees when a child. Balzac often paid him visits, especially when he wanted to meditate over some serious work, as he found the solitude and pure air, and the fact that he was treated in the neighbourhood simply as a native of the country and not as a celebrity, peculiarly stimulating to his imagination and powers of creation. He wrote "Louis Lambert," among other novels, at the house of this hospitable friend. Madame de Margonne he did not care for: she was, according to his unflattering portrait of her, intolerant and devout, deformed, and not at all spirituelle. But she did not count for much; Balzac went to the house for the sake of her husband.

An intimacy was formed about this time between Balzac and La Touche, the editor of the Figaro, who, as has been already mentioned, helped him in the prosaic task of nailing up draperies. This intimacy must have been of great value to Balzac's education in the art of literature, and is remarkable for that reason in the history of a man in whose writings small trace of outside influence can be descried, and who, except in the case of Théophile Gautier, seemed little affected by the thought of his contemporaries. Therefore, though a long way behind Madame de Berny—without whom Balzac, as we know him, would hardly have existed—La Touche deserves recognition for his work, however small, in moulding the literary ideals and forming the taste of the great writer. Besides this, his friendship with Balzac is almost unique in the history of the latter, in the fact that, for some reason we do not know, it was suddenly broken off; and that almost the only occasion when Balzac showed personal dislike almost amounting to hatred, in criticism, was when, in 1840, in the Revue Parisienne, he published an article on "Léo," a novel by La Touche. He became, George Sand says, completely indifferent to his old master, while the latter—a pathetic, yet thorny and uncomfortable figure, as portrayed by his contemporaries—continued to belittle and revile his former pupil, while all the time he loved him, and longed for a reconciliation which never took place. La Touche had a quick instinct for discovering genius: he introduced André Chénier's posthumous poems to the public, and launched Jules Sandeau and George Sand. But he was soured by seeing his pupils enter the promised land only open to genius, while he was left outside himself. Sooner or later, the eager, affected little hypochondriacal man with the bright eyes quarrelled with all his friends, and a rupture would naturally soon take place between the ultra-sensitive teacher, ready to take offence on the smallest pretext, and the hearty, robust Tourainean, who, whatever his troubles might be, faced the world with a laugh, who insisted on his genius with cheery egotism, and who, in spite of real goodheartedness and depth of affection, was too full of himself to be always careful about the feelings of others. How much Balzac owed to La Touche we do not know; but though, as we have already seen, there were other reasons for his sudden stride in literature between 1825 and 1828, it is significant that "Les Chouans," the first book to which he affixed his name, and in which his genius really shows itself, was written directly after his intercourse with this literary teacher. No doubt La Touche, who was cursed with the miserable fate of possessing the temperament of genius without the electric spark itself, magnified the help he had given, and felt extreme bitterness at the shortness of memory shown by the great writer, whom he vainly strove to sting into feeling by the acerbity of his attacks.

Never at any time did Balzac go out much into society, but his anonymous novels, though they did not bring him fame, had opened to him the doors of several literary and artistic salons, and he was a frequenter of that of Madame Sophie Gay, the author of several novels, one of which, "Anatole," is said to have been read by Napoleon during the last night spent at Fontainebleau in 1814. Hers was essentially an Empire salon, antagonistic to the government of the Bourbons, and Balzac's feelings were perhaps occasionally ruffled by the talk that went on around him, though more probably the interest he found in the study of different phases of opinion outweighed his party prepossessions. Those evenings must have been an anxious pleasure; for, with no money to pay a cab fare, there was always the agonising question as to whether on arrival his boots would be of spotless cleanliness, while the extravagance of a pair of white gloves meant a diminution in food which it was not pleasant to contemplate. Then, too, he felt savage disgust at the elegant costumes and smart cabriolets owned by empty-headed fops with insufferable airs of conquest, who looked at him askance, and to whom he could not prove the genius which was in him, or give voice to his belief that some day he would dominate them all. The restlessness and discomfort, and at the same time the sense of unknown and fascinating possibilities which are the birthright of talented youth, and in the portrayal of which Balzac is supreme, must have been well known to him by experience; and his almost Oriental love of beauty and luxury made his life of grinding poverty peculiarly galling.

Conspicuous in her mother's salon, queen of conversationalists, reciting verses in honour of the independence of Greece, exciting peals of laughter by her wit and her power to draw out that of others, was a brilliant figure—that of the beautiful Delphine Gay, who was, in 1831, to become Madame de Girardin. She is a charming figure.

a woman with unfailing tact and a singular lack of literary jealousy, so that all her contemporaries speak of her with affection. She made strenuous efforts to keep the peace between Balzac and her husband, the autocratic editor of La Presse; and till 1847, when the final rupture took place, Balzac's real liking for her conquered his resentment at what he considered unjustifiable proceedings on the part of her husband. Once indeed there was a complete cessation of friendly relations, and even dark hints about a duel; but usually Madame de Girardin prevailed; and though there were many recriminations on both sides, and several times nearly an explosion, Balzac wrote for La Presse, visited her salon, and was generally on terms of politeness with her husband. She was proud of her beautiful complexion, and had a drawing-room hung with pale green satin to show it to the best advantage; while, like her mother, she wrote novels, one of which she called "La Canne de M. de Balzac," after the novelist's famous cane adorned with turquoises.

One of the habituées of Madame Gay's salon was the Duchesse d'Abrantès; and between her and Balzac there existed a literary comradeship, possibly cemented by the impecunious condition which was common to both. In 1827 she lived at Versailles; and whenever Balzac went to see his parents, he also paid her a visit; when long talks took place about their mutual struggles, misfortunes and hopes of gaining money by writing.

The poor woman was always in monetary difficulties. After the fall of the Empire and the death of her husband, whom she courageously followed throughout his campaign in Spain, she continued to live in the same luxury that had surrounded her during her days of splendour; and as the Bourbon Government refused to help her, she was soon reduced to a state of destitution, and turned to her pen to gain money to pay off her creditors. She wrote several novels, which at this time are completely forgotten; but in 1831 she began to bring out her Memoirs, and these give a graphic account of the social life under the Empire, and have become a classic. These Memoirs were first published in sixteen volumes, and it must have been a relief to the public when a second edition, consisting of only twelve volumes, was brought out three years later.

In 1829, the time of which we are now writing, Balzac could only sympathise when the poor Duchess, formerly raised to great heights and now fallen very low, felt depressed at her reverses, and took a gloomy view of life. He would assure her that happiness could not possibly be over for ever, and would predict a bright dawn some future day; while as soon as he began to prosper himself, he did his best to lend her a helping hand. He effected an introduction to Charles Rabou, so that her articles were received by the Revue de Paris, and he assisted as intermediary between her and the publishers, taking infinite trouble on her behalf, and in the end gaining most advantageous terms for her. No assistance, however, was of permanent use. She, who knew so much, had never learnt to manage money, and, helped by her eldest son Napoléon d'Abrantès, she spent every penny she earned. On July 7th, 1838, she died in the utmost poverty in a miserable room in the Rue des Batailles, having been turned out of the hospital, where she had hoped to end her days in peace, because she could not pay her expenses in advance. Balzac writes to Madame Hanska: "The papers will have told you about the Duchesse d'Abrantès' deplorable death. She ended as the Empire ended. Some day I will explain this woman to you; it will be a nice evening's occupation at Wierzchownia." *

Another of Balzac's friendships, rather different in character from those already mentioned, was that with George Sand, "his brother George" he used to call her. He first made her acquaintance in 1831, and would often go puffing up the stairs of the five-storied house on the Quai Saint-Michel, at the top of which she lived. His ostensible object was to give advice about her writing, but in reality he would leave this comparatively uninteresting subject very quickly, and pour out floods of talk about his own novels. "Ah, I have found something else! You will see! you will see! A splendid idea! a situation! a dialogue! No one has ever seen anything like it!" "It was joy, laughter, and a superabundance of enthusiasm, of which one cannot give any idea. And this after nights without slumber and days without repose," * remarks George Sand.

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

There were limitations in his view of her, as he never fully realised the scope of her genius, and looked on her as half a man, so that he would sometimes shock her by the breadth of his conversation. After her rupture with Jules Sandeau, whose side in the affair he espoused vehemently, he disapproved of her for some time, and contrasted rather contemptuously the versatility of her affairs of the heart with the ideal of passionate, enduring love portrayed in her novels. However, later on, when he himself had been disappointed in Sandeau, and when the latter had further roused his indignation by writing a novel called "Marianna," which was intended to drag George Sand's name through the mud, Balzac defended her energetically. About the same time (1839) he brought out his novel "Béatrix," in which she is portrayed as Mlle. des Touches, with "the beauty of Isis, more serious than gracious, and as if struck with the sadness of constant meditation." Her eyes, according to Balzac, were her great beauty, and all her expression was in them, otherwise her face was stupid; but with her splendid black hair and her complexion—olive by day and white in artificial light—she must have been a striking and picturesque figure. Later on Balzac appears to have partly reconciled himself to her moral irregularities, on the convenient ground that she, like himself, was an exceptional being; and we hear of several visits he paid to Nohant, where he delighted in long hours of talk on social questions with a comrade to whom he need not show the galanteries d'épiderme necessary in intercourse with ordinary women. He says of her: "She had no littleness of soul, and none of those low jealousies which obscure so much contemporary talent. Dumas is like her on this point. George Sand is a very noble friend." *

* "Autour de la Table," by George Sand.

This is all anticipation; we must now go back to 1828 and 1829, and picture Balzac's existence first in the Rue de Tournon and then in one room at the Rue Cassini. Insufficiently clad and wretchedly fed, he occasionally went to evening parties to collect material for his writing; at other times he visited some sympathising friend, and poured out his troubles to her; but he had only one real support—the sympathy and affection of Madame de Berny. It was a frightfully hard life. He took coffee to keep himself awake, and he wrote and wrote till he was exhausted; all the time being in the condition of a "tracked hare," harassed and pursued by his creditors, and knowing that all his gains must go to them.

His only relaxations were little visits. He went to Tours, where he danced at a ball with a girl with red hair, and with another so little "that a man would only marry her that she might act as a pin for his shirt." * He travelled to Saché, to see M. de Margonne; to Champrosay, where he met his sister; and to Fougères in Brittany, at the invitation of the Baron de Pommereul. During the last-named visit, as we have already seen, he not only collected the material, but also wrote the greater part of his novel "Les Chouans," which proved the turning-point of his career.

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

This novel, the first signed with his name, Honoré Balzac, was published by Canel and Levavasseur in March, 1829, and in December of the same year the "Physiologie du Mariage by a Célibataire," appeared, and excited general attention; though many people, Madame Carraud among the number, were much shocked by it. Each of these books brought in about £50—not a large sum, especially when we think that Balzac must at this time have owed about £2,000; but he had now his foot upon the first rung of the ladder of fame, and editors and publishers began to apply to him for novels and articles.

It is a curious fact that Balzac, who answered a question put to him during his lawsuit against the Revue de Paris on the subject of his right to the prefix "de," with the rather grandiloquent words, "My name is on my certificate of birth, as that of the Duke of Fitz-James is on his," † should on the title-page of "Les Chouans" have called himself

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 82.

† First Preface to the "Lys dans la Vallée," p. 482, vol. xxii. of "Œuvres Complètes de H. de Balzac," Édition définitive.

simply M. H. Balzac, and on that of the "Scènes de la Vie Privée," which appeared in April, 1830, M. Balzac, still without the "de." In 1826 he gives his designation and title as "H. Balzac, imprimeur, Rue des Marais, St.-Germain, 31," and we have already seen that he was entered on the school register as Honoré Balzac, and that his parents at that time called themselves M. and Mme. Balzac. Occasionally, however, as early as 1822, in letters to his sister Honoré insists on the particle "de," and all his life he claimed to be a member of a very old Gaulish family—a pretension which gave his enemies a famous opportunity for deriding him. In 1836, during his lawsuit with the Revue de Paris, he certainly spoke on the subject with no doubtful voice:

"Even if my name sounds too well in certain ears, even if it is envied by those who are not pleased with their own, I cannot give it up. My father was quite within his rights on this subject, having consulted the records in the Archive Office. He was proud of being one of the conquered race, of a family which in Auvergne had resisted the invasion, and from which the D'Entragues took their origin. He discovered in the Archive Office the notice of a grant of land made by the Balzacs to establish a monastery in the environs of the little town of Balzac, and a copy of this was, he told me, registered by his care at the Parliament of Paris." *

Balzac continues for some time in this strain,

* See First Preface to the "Lys dans la Vallée."

giving his enemies a fresh handle for ridicule. After the loss of the lawsuit, the Revue de Paris, raging with indignation, answered him with "Un dernier mot à M. de Balzac," an article which the writer, after a reflection full of venom, must have dashed off with set teeth and a sardonic smile, and in which there is a most scathing paragraph on the vexed question of the "de":

"He [Balzac] tells us that he is of an old Gaulish family (You understand, "Gaulish"—one of Charlemagne's peers! A French family, what is that? Gaulish!) It is not his own fault, poor man! Further, M. de Balzac will prove to you that the Bourbons and the Montmorencies and other French gentlemen must lower their armorial bearings before him, who is a Gaul, and more—a Gaul of old family! In fact, this name 'De Balzac' is a patronymic name (patronymically ridiculous and Gaulish). He has always been De Balzac, only that! while the Montmorencies—those unfortunate Montmorencies—were formerly called Couchard; and the Bourbons—a secondary family who are neither patronymic nor Gaulish (of old Gaulish family is of course understood) were called Capet. M. de Balzac is therefore more noble than the King!"

Towards the end, rage renders the talented writer slightly incoherent, and we can imagine a blotted and illegible manuscript; but the question raised is an interesting one, and Balzac attached great importance to it. A favourite form of spite with his enemies was to adopt the same measures as did this writer, who, except in the title, calls him throughout "M. Balzac," a form of insult which possessed the double advantage of imposing no strain on the mind of the attacking party, and yet of hitting the victim on a peculiarly tender spot.

Balzac's statement that he was entered "De Balzac" on the register of his birth is on the face of it untrue, as he was born on the 2nd Prairial of the year VII., a time when all titles were proscribed; so that the omission of the "de" means nothing, while his contention that he dropped the "de" in 1826, because he would not soil his noble name by associating it with trade, might very easily be correct. Unfortunately, however, for Balzac's argument, when old M. Balzac died, on June 19th, 1829, he was described in the register as Bernard François Balzac, without the "de." He does not even seem to have stood on his rights during his lifetime, as in 1826, after the death of Laurence, who had become Madame de Montzaigle—it must have been a satisfaction to the Balzac family to have one indisputable "de" among them—cards in answer to condolences were sent out in the names of M. and Madame Balzac, M. and Madame Surville, and MM. Honoré and Henri Balzac.

Still, it might be possible for us to maintain, if it so pleased us, that, in spite of certain evidence to the contrary, the Balzacs were simple, unpreten-tious people, who, having dropped the "de" at the time of the Revolution, did not care to resume it; but here M. Edmond Biré, who furnishes us with the information already given, completely cuts the ground away from under our feet. It appears that M. Charles Portal, the well-known antiquary, has in his researches discovered the birth register of old M. Balzac. He was born on July 22nd, 1746, at La Nougarie, in the parish of Saint-Martin de Canezac, and is described in this document, not as Balzac at all, but as Bernard François Balssa, the son of a labourer! At what date he took the name of Balzac, and whether his celebrated son knew of the harmless deception, we do not know; but possibly his change of name was another of the little reserves which the clever old gentleman thought it necessary to maintain about his past life, and Honoré really considered himself a member of an old family.

At any rate, as M. Biré says, he certainly earned by his pen the right to nobility, and in this account of him he will be known by his usual appellation of "De Balzac."

CHAPTER VI

1829—1832

Work and increasing fame—Émile de Girardin—Balzac's early relations with the Revue de Paris and quarrel with Amédée Pichot—First letters from Madame Hanska and the Marquise de Castries—Balzac's extraordinary mode of writing—Burlesque account of it from the Figaro.

THE record of the next few years of Balzac's life is a difficult one, so many and varied were the interests crowded into them, so short the hours of sleep, and so long the nights of work, followed without rest by an eight hours' day of continual rush. Visits to printers, publishers, and editors, worrying interviews with creditors, and letters on business, politics, and literature, followed each other in bewilderingly quick succession, and the only respite was to be found in occasional talks with such friends as Madame de Berny, Madame Carraud, or the Duchesse d'Abrantès.

Success was arriving. But success with Balzac never meant leisure, or relief from a heavy burden of debt; it merely gave scope for enormous prodigies of labour. His passion for work amounted to a disease; and who can measure the gamut of emotion, ranging from rapture down to straining effort, which was gone through in those silent hours of darkness, when the man, the best part of whom lived only in solitude and night, sat in his monk's habit, before a writing-table littered with papers? Then, impelled by the genius of creation, he would allow his imagination full sway, and would turn to account the material collected by his keen powers of observation and his unparalleled intuition. It was strenuous labour, with the attendant joy of calling every faculty, including the highest of all—that of creation—into activity, and the hours no doubt often passed like moments. But the fierce battling with expression, the effort to tax superabundant powers to the utmost, left their mark; and in the morning Balzac would drag himself to the printer or publisher, with his hair in disorder, his lips dry, and his forehead lined.

Jules Sandeau, who had been taken by Balzac to live with him, and who remarked that he would rather die than work as he did, says that sometimes, when the passion and inspiration for writing were strong on him, he would shut himself up for three weeks in his closely curtained room, never breathing the outside air or knowing night from day. When utterly exhausted, he would throw himself on his pallet-bed for a few hours, and slumber heavily and feverishly; and when he could fast no longer, he would call for a meal, which must, however, be scanty, because digestion would divert the blood from the brain. Otherwise, hour after hour, he sat before his square table, and concentrated his powerful mind on his work, utterly oblivious of the fact that there was anything in the world save the elbowing, crushing throng of phantom—yet to him absolutely real—personages, whom he took into his being, and in whose life he lived. For the time he felt with their feelings, saw with their eyes, became possessed by them, as the great actor becomes possessed by the personality he represents. "C'était un voyant, non un observateur," as Philarète Chasles said with truth.

CARNEGIE
PITT

In 1829 Balzac was introduced by the publisher M. Levavasseur to Émile de Girardin, who became—and the connection was life-long—what Mme. de Girardin called La Touche,—an "intimate enemy." At first all was harmony. Émile de Girardin's letters, beginning in 1830 with "Mon très-cher Monsieur," are addressed in 1831 to "Mon cher Balzac"; but it is doubtful whether the finish of one written in October, 1830, and ending with "Amitié d'ambition ! ! !" * is exactly flattering to the recipient—it savours rather strongly of what is termed in vulgar parlance "cupboard love." However, Girardin was the first to recognise the great writer's talents, and at the end of 1829, or the beginning of 1830, after having inserted an article by Balzac in La Mode, of which he was editor, he invited his collaboration, as well as that of Victor Varaigne, Hippolyte Auger, and Bois le Comte, in forming a bibliographical supplement to the daily papers, which was to be entitled "Le feuilleton des journaux politiques." This was a failure, but Balzac was associated with Émile de Girardin in several other literary enterprises; and it was through the agency of this energetic editor that he wrote his letters on Paris in the Voleur, which, extending from September 26th, 1830, to March 29th, 1831, would form a volume in themselves. After the Revolution of 1830 stories went out of fashion, the reviews and magazines being completely occupied with the task of discussing the political situation; and Balzac wrote numberless articles in the Silhouette, which was edited by Victor Ratier, and in the Caricature, edited by M. Philippon. A few years later, the latter journal became violently political; but at this time it consisted merely of witty and amusing articles, ridiculing all parties impartially.

* "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," p. 105, by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

With Victor Ratier, Balzac contemplated a partnership in writing for the theatre, though he thought Ratier hardly sufficiently industrious to make a satisfactory collaborator. However, he threatened him in case of laziness with a poor and honest young man as a rival, and, to rouse Ratier to energy, remarked that the unnamed prodigy was, like himself, full of courage, whereas Ratier resembled "an Indian on his mat."* Balzac's imaginative brain was to supply the plot and characters of each drama; but he was careful, as in the case of his early novels, that his name should not appear, as the plays were to be mere vaudevilles written to gain money, and would certainly not increase their author's reputation. Ratier was therefore to pose as their sole author, and was to undertake the actual writing of the play, unless he were too lazy for the effort, when the honest and unfortunate young man would take his place. The pecuniary part of the bargain was not mentioned, except the fact that both partners would become enormously rich ; and that result is so invariable a characteristic of Balzac's schemes that it need hardly be noticed. However, this brilliant plan came to nothing, not, as we may suppose, from any failure on the part of the indolent Ratier—as there was in this case his unnamed rival to fall back upon —but most probably because its promoter had not a moment's leisure in which to think of it again.

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 115.

Towards the end of 1830 he began to write for the Revue de Paris, a journal with which his relations, generally inharmonious, culminated in the celebrated lawsuit of 1836. The review was at this time the property of a company ; and the sole object of the shareholders being to obtain large dividends, they adopted the short-sighted policy of cutting down their payment to authors, a course which led to continual recriminations, and naturally made the office of chief editor very difficult. When Balzac first wrote for the review, Charles Rabou held this post, following Dr. Véron ; but he resigned in a few months, and was succeeded in his turn by Amédée Pichot. With him Balzac waged continual war, finally dealing a heavy blow to the review by deserting it altogether in 1833.

The cause of the dispute, in the first instance, was one which often reappears in the history of Balzac's relations with different editors. Being happily possessed of devoted friends, who allowed him complete freedom while he stayed with them, he found it easier to write in the quiet of the country than amidst the worries and distractions of Paris. In 1830, after travelling in Brittany, he spent four months, from July to November, at La Grenadière, that pretty little house near to Saint-Cyr-sur-Loire, which he coveted continually, but never succeeded in acquiring. In 1834 he thought the arrangements for its purchase were at last settled. After three years of continual refusals, the owners had consented to sell, and he already imagined himself surrounded with books, and established for six months at a time at this studious retreat. However, pecuniary difficulties came as usual in the way, and except as a visitor, Balzac never tasted the joys of a country life.

From La Grenadière he wrote a remarkable letter to Ratier,* full of love for the beauty of nature, a feeling which filled him with a sense of the littleness of man, and expressing also that uncomfortable doubt which must occasionally assail the mind of any man possessed of powerful physique as well as imagination—the doubt whether the existence of the thinker is not after all a poor thing compared with that of the active worker, who is tossed about, risks his life, and himself creates a living drama. He finishes with the words: "And it seems to me that the sea, a man-of-war, and an English boat to destroy, with a chance of drowning, are better than an inkpot, and a pen, and the Rue Saint-Denis."

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 98.

In May, 1831, Balzac was again away from Paris, this time taking up his abode in Nemours, where he describes himself as living alone in a tent in the depths of the earth, subsisting on coffee, and working day and night at "La Peau de Chagrin," with "L'Auberge Rouge," which he was writing for the Revue de Paris, as his only distraction.

These absences did not apparently cause any friction; but when, in November, 1831, Balzac went to Saché to stay with M. de Margonne, and then moved on to the Carrauds, he left "Le Maître Cornélius," which he was writing for the Revue de Paris, in an unfinished and uncorrected condition. Thereupon, Amédée Pichot, who naturally wanted consecutive numbers of the story for his magazine, committed what was in Balzac's eyes an unpardonable breach of trust, by publishing the uncorrected proofs, leaving out or altering what he did not understand. Balzac was furious at his signature being appended to what he considered unfinished work. Amédée Pichot was also very angry, because Balzac had unduly lengthened the first part of the story, and had kept him two months waiting for the finish. Therefore, as diligence was the only mode of transit, and it was necessary that "Le Maître Cornélius" should end with the year, it was impossible to send the proofs before printing for correction to Angoulême. Nevertheless, as he had undoubtedly exceeded his rights as editor, he thought it wise to temporise, and wrote an explanatory and conciliatory letter; and as this did not pacify Balzac, he dispatched a second of similar tenor. However, a few days later, on January 9th, 1832, he felt compelled by the tone of Balzac's correspondence to send a third beginning: "Sir, I find from the tone of your letter that I am guilty of doing you a great wrong. I have treated on an equality and as a comrade a superior person, whom I should have been contented to admire. I therefore beg your pardon humbly for the 'My dear Balzac' of my preceding letters. I will preserve the distance of 'Monsieur' between you and me." *

Nevertheless, in spite of the uncompromising commencement of the letter, we can realise the extent of Balzac's success at this time, by the fact that, though Pichot was in a state of intense irritation, he was still anxious, in his capacity as editor, to soothe and content the indignant writer, and to induce him to continue his contributions to the Revue de Paris.

However, Balzac was furious. His respect for his own name and his intense literary conscientiousness were stronger even than his desire for money, and it was a very black crime in his eyes

* "Une Page Perdue de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul; from which the whole account of the dispute between Balzac and Pichot is taken.

for any one to produce one of his works before the public until it had been brought to the highest possible pitch of perfection. This intense anxiety to do his best, which caused him the most painstaking labour, often pressed very hardly on managers of magazines. He was generally paid in advance, so that his money was safe; and though he could be absolutely trusted to finish sooner or later what he had undertaken, he showed a lofty indifference to the exigencies of monthly publication. Moreover, as is shown in the evidence given later on during his lawsuit with the Revue de Paris, he would sometimes, in his haste for money, accept new engagements when he already had a plethora of work in hand. Nevertheless, whatever the failures to fulfil a contract on his part might be, he was implacable towards those who did not rightly discharge their obligations to him; and Pichot was never forgiven. In September, 1832, after endless disputes about the rate and terms of payment, that most fertile source of recriminations between Balzac and his various publishers and editors, a formal treaty was drawn up between the great writer, who was at Saché, and Amédée Pichot, as director of the Revue de Paris. By this, with the option of breaking the connection after six months, Balzac undertook to write for the Review for a year, being still entitled during that time to furnish articles to the Rénovateur, the Journal Quotidienne Politique, and L'Artiste. In spite of this legal document, there were many disputed points; and the letters which passed between the two men, and which now began with the formal "Monsieur," were full of bickerings about money matters, about Balzac's delay in furnishing copy, and about the length of his contributions. On one occasion Pichot is severe in his rebukes, because Balzac has prevented the Duchesse d'Abrantès from providing a promised article, by telling her that his own writing will fill two whole numbers of the Revue. On another, it is curious to find that Balzac, who was rather ashamed of the immoral reputation of his works, thanks M. Pichot quite humbly for suppressing a passage in the "Voyage de Paris à Java," which the director considered unfit for family perusal, and excuses himself on the subject with the naïve explanation that he was at the same time writing the "Contes Drôlatiques"! * Finally, in March, 1833, after six months of the treaty had expired, Balzac withdrew altogether from the Revue de Paris. He gave no explicit explanation for this step; but in 1836, at the time of his lawsuit with the Revue de Paris, he stated as the reason for his desertion that he considered Pichot to be the author, under different pseudonyms, of the adverse criticism of his novels which appeared in its pages. In the Revue he had, among other novels, brought out the beginning of "L'Histoire des Treize," and the parsimonious shareholders now had the mortification of seeing the great man carry his wares to L'Europe Littéraire; while the Revue de Paris, in consequence of his desertion, declined in popularity.

* "Autour de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

Balzac was now fairly launched on the road of literary fame, and some of his writings at this time had a momentous influence on his life. In April, 1830, Madame Hanska, his future wife, read with delight, in her far-off château in Ukraine, the "Scènes de la Vie Privée," containing the "Vendetta," "Les Dangers de l'Inconduite," "Le Bal de Sceaux, ou Le Pair de France," "Gloire et Malheur," "La Femme Vertueuse" and "La Paix de Ménage"—two volumes which Balzac had published as quickly as he could, to counteract the alienation of his women-readers by the "Physiologie du Mariage." In August, 1831, appeared "La Peau de Chagrin," which so disappointed Madame Hanska by its cynical tone, that she was impelled to write the first letter from L'Étrangère, which reached Balzac on February 28th, 1832, a date never to be forgotten in the annals of his life. He was not, however, very exact in remembering it himself, and in later life sometimes became confused in his calculations between the number of years since he had received this letter, and the time which had elapsed since he first had the joy of meeting her. "La Peau de Chagrin" greatly increased Balzac's fame, and in October, 1831, another anonymous correspondent, Madame la Marquise de Castries, also destined to exercise a strong, though perhaps transitory, influence over

Balzac, had written to deprecate its moral tone, as well as that of the "Physiologie du Mariage." Balzac answered her that "La Peau de Chagrin" was only intended to be part of a whole, and must not be judged alone; and the same idea is enlarged upon in a letter to the Comte de Montalembert,* written in August, 1831, which shows Balzac's extreme anxiety not to dissociate his writings from the cause of religion. In it he explains, with much insistence, that, in spite of the apparent scepticism of "La Peau de Chagrin," the idea of God is really the mainspring of the whole book, and on these grounds he begs for a review in L'Avenir. The letter also contains an announcement which is interesting as a proof that two years before the date given by his sister, the idea of his great systematic work was already formulated, and that in his imagination it had assumed colossal proportions. He says: "'La Peau de Chagrin' is the formula of human life, an abstraction made from individualities, and, as M. Ballanche says, everything in it is myth and allegory. It is therefore the point of departure for my work. Afterwards individualities and particular existences, from the most humble to those of the King and of the Priest, the highest expressions of our society, will group themselves according to their rank. In these pictures I shall follow the effect of Thought on Life. Then another work, entitled 'History of the Succession of the Marquis of Carabas,' will formulate the life of nations, the phases of their governments, and will show decidedly that politics turn in one circle, and are evidently stationary; and that repose can only be found in the strong government of a hierarchy."

* Letters sent by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul to the Revue Bleue, November 14th, 1903.

The "Peau de Chagrin," which is a powerful satire on the vice and selfishness of the day, suffers in its allegorical, though not in its humanly interesting side, by the vivid picture it gives of Balzac's youth; as, in spite of the introduction of the influence of the magic Ass Skin, the account of Raphael in the early part of the book, as the frugal, determined genius with high intellectual aspirations, does not harmonise with his weak, despicable character as it unfolds itself subsequently. The critics exercised their minds greatly about the identity of the heroines, the beautiful and heartless Fédora—in whom apparently many ladies recognised their own portrait—and the humble and exquisite Pauline, type of devoted and self-forgetting love. Mademoiselle Pélissier, who possessed an income of twenty-five thousand francs, and had a house in the Rue Neuve-du-Luxembourg, where she held a salon much frequented by political personalities of the day, was identified by popular gossip as the model of Fédora. It was said by Parisian society that Balzac was anxious to marry her, but that the lady, who afterwards became Madame Rossini, refused to listen to his suit, though she confessed to a great admiration for his fascinating black eyes.

The original of Pauline has never been discovered, but, possibly with a few traits borrowed from Madame de Berny, she is what Balzac describes in the last pages of "La Peau de Chagrin" as an "ideal, as a visionary face in the fire, a face with unimaginable delicate outlines, a floating apparition, which no chance will ever bring back again."

Since the year 1830 Balzac had lodged in the Rue Cassini, a little, unfrequented street near the Observatory, with a wall running along one side, on which was written "L'Absolu, marchand de briques," a name which Théophile Gautier fancies may have suggested to him the title of his novel "La Recherche de l'Absolu." Borget, Balzac's great friend and confidant, had rooms in the same house; and later on, when Borget was on one of his frequent journeys, these rooms were occupied by Jules Sandeau, after his parting with George Sand. In despair at her desertion, he tried to commit suicide; and Balzac, touched with pity at his forlorn condition, proposed that he should come to Borget's rooms, and took complete and kindly charge of him—a generosity which Sandeau, after having lived at Balzac's expense for two years, repaid in 1836, by deserting his benefactor when he was in difficulties.

Balzac was now in the full swing of work. He writes to the Duchesse d'Abrantès in 1831:* "Write, I cannot! the fatigue is too great. You do not know what I owed in 1828, above what I possessed. I had only my pen with which to earn my living, and to pay a hundred and twenty thousand francs. In several months I shall have paid everything, and I shall have arranged my poor little household ; but for six months I have all the troubles of poverty, I enjoy my last miseries. I have begged from nobody, I have not held out my hand for a penny ; I have hidden my sorrows, and my wounds."

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 131.

Poor Balzac ! over and over again we hear the same story about the beautiful time in the future, which he saw coming nearer and nearer, but which always evaded his grasp at the last. Very often, when he appears grasping and dictatorial in his business dealings, we may trace his want of urbanity to some pressing pecuniary anxiety, which he was too proud to reveal. No doubt these difficulties often sprang from his extraordinary want of reflection and prudence, as his desire to make a dashing appearance before the world led him frequently into the most senseless extravagance. For instance, when he went out of Paris in June, 1832, intending to travel for several months, he left behind him two horses with nothing to do, but naturally requiring a groom, food, and stabling ; and it was not till the end of July that, on his mother's recommendation, he sent orders that they were to be sold. His money affairs are so complicated, and his own accounts of them so conflicting, that it is impossible to understand them roughly. Apparently, however, from 1827 to 36 he could not support himself and satisfy his ditors without drawing bills. These he often ıld not meet, and had to renew; and the cumulated interest on these obligations formed floating debt, which was from time to time reased by some new extravagance.

In his vain struggles to escape, he worked as rely no man has ever worked before or since. 1830 he brought out about seventy, and in 1831 out seventy-five publications, including novels, d articles serious and satirical, on politics and neral topics; and in twelve years, from 1830 to 42, he wrote seventy-nine novels alone, not unting his shorter compositions. Werdet, who came his publisher in 1834, gives a curious count of his doings; and this may, with slight odifications, be accepted as a picture of his ual mode of life when in the full swing of com- ition.

He usually went to bed at eight o'clock, after a ht dinner, accompanied by a glass or two of ouvray, his favourite wine; and he was seated at s desk by two o'clock in the morning. He wrote om that time till six, only occasionally refreshing nself with coffee from a coffee-pot which was rmanently in the fireplace. At six he had his h, in which he remained for an hour, and s servant afterwards brought him more coffee. Verdet was then admitted to bring proofs, take vay the corrected ones, and wrest, if possible, fresh manuscript from him. From nine he wrote till noon, when he breakfasted on two boiled eggs and some bread, and from one till six the labour of correction went on again. This unnatural life lasted for six weeks or two months, during which time he refused to see even his most intimate friends; and then he plunged again into the ordinary affairs of life, or mysteriously and suddenly disappeared—to be next heard of in some distant part of France, or perhaps in Corsica, Sardinia, or Italy. It is not surprising that even in these early days, and in spite of Balzac's exuberant vitality, there are frequent mentions of terrible fatigue and lassitude, and that the services of his lifelong friend, Dr. Nacquart, were often in requisition, though his warnings about the dangers of overwork were generally unheeded.

Even with Balzac's extraordinary power of work, the number of his writings is remarkable, when we consider the labour their composition cost him. Sometimes, according to Théophile Gautier, he bestowed a whole night's labour on one phrase, and wrote it over and over again a hundred times, the exact words that he wanted only coming to him after he had exhausted all the possible approximate forms. When he intended to begin a novel, and had thought of and lived in a subject for some time, he wrote a plan of his proposed work in several pages, and dispatched this to the printer, who separated the different headings, and sent them back, each on a large sheet of blank paper. Balzac

BALZAC'S HANDWRITING.

FACSIMILE OF THE LAST PAGE OF AN ARTICLE ENTITLED: "DU GOUVERNEMENT MODERNE," WRITTEN BY BALZAC AT AIX IN 1832.

[To face p. 1

read these headings attentively, and applied to them his critical faculty. Some he rejected altogether, others he corrected, but everywhere he made additions. Lines were drawn from the beginning, the middle, and the end of each sentence towards the margin of the paper; each line leading to an interpolation, a development, an added epithet or an adverb. At the end of several hours the sheet of paper looked like a plan of fireworks, and later on the confusion was further complicated by signs of all sorts crossing the lines, while scraps of paper covered with amplifications were pinned or stuck with sealing-wax to the margin. This sheet of hieroglyphics was sent to the printing-office, and was the despair of the typographers; who, as Balzac overheard, stipulated for only an hour each in turn at the correction of his proofs. Next day the amplified placards came back, and Balzac added further details, and laboured to fit the expression exactly to the idea, and to attain perfection of outline and symmetry of proportion. Sometimes one episode dwarfed the rest, or a secondary figure usurped the central position on his canvas, and then he would heroically efface the results of four or five nights' labour. Six, seven, even ten times, were the proofs sent backwards and forwards, before the great writer was satisfied.

In the Figaro of December 15th, 1837, Edouard Ourliac gives a burlesque account of the confusion caused in the printing-offices by Balzac's peculiar methods of composition. This is an extract from the article:

"Let us sing, drink and embrace, like the chorus of an opéra comique. Let us stretch our calves, and turn on our toes like ballet-dancers. Let us at last rejoice: the Figaro, without getting the credit of it, has overcome the elements and all sublunary cataclysms.

"Hercules is only a rascal, the apples of Hesperides only turnips, the siege of Troy but a revolt of the national guard. The Figaro has just conquered 'César Birotteau'!

"Never have the angry gods, never have Juno, Neptune, M. de Rambuteau, or the Prefect of Police, opposed to Jason, Theseus, or walkers in Paris, more obstacles, monsters, ruins, dragons, demolitions, than these two unfortunate octavos have fought against.

"We have them at last, and we know what they have cost. The public will only have the trouble of reading them. That will be a pleasure. As to M. de Balzac—twenty days' work, two handfuls of paper, one more beautiful book: that counts for nothing.

"However it may be, it is a typographical exploit, a literary and industrial tour de force worthy to be remembered. Writer, editor, and printer have deserved more or less from their country. Posterity will talk of the compositors, and our descendants will regret that they do not know the names of the apprentices. I already, like them, regret it, otherwise I would mention them.

"The Figaro had promised the book on December 15th, and M. de Balzac began it on November 17th. M. de Balzac and the Figaro both have the strange habit of keeping their word. The printing-office was ready, and stamping its foot like a restive charger.

"M. de Balzac sends two hundred pages pencilled in five nights of fever. One knows his way. It was a sketch, a chaos, an apocalypse, a Hindoo poem.

"The printing-office paled. The delay is short, the writing unheard of. They transform the monster; they translate it as much as possible into known signs. The cleverest still understand nothing. They take it to the author.

"The author sends back the first proofs, glued on to enormous pages, posters, screens. It is now that you may shiver and feel pity. The appearance of these sheets is monstrous. From each sign, from each printed word, go pen lines, which radiate and meander like a Congreve rocket, and spread themselves out at the margin in a luminous rain of phrases, epithets, and substantives, underlined, crossed, mixed, erased, superposed: the effect is dazzling.

"Imagine four or five hundred arabesques of this sort, interlaced, knotted, climbing and sliding from one margin to another, and from the south to the north. Imagine twelve maps on the top of each other, entangling towns, rivers, and mountains —a skein tangled by a cat, all the hieroglyphics of the dynasty of Pharaoh, or the fireworks of twenty festivities.

"At this sight the printing-office does not rejoice. The compositors strike their breasts, the printing-presses groan, the foremen tear their hair, their apprentices lose their heads. The most intelligent attack the proofs, and recognise Persian, others Malagash, some the symbolic characters of Vishnu. They work by chance and by the grace of God.

"Next day M. de Balzac returns two pages of pure Chinese. The delay is only fifteen days. A generous foreman offers to blow out his brains.

"Two new sheets arrive, written very legibly in Siamese. Two workmen lose their sight and the small command of language they possessed.

"The proofs are thus sent backwards and forwards seven times.

"Several symptoms of excellent French begin to be recognised, even some connection between the phrases is observed."

So the article proceeds; always in a tone of comic good-temper, but pointing to a very real grievance and point of dispute; and helping the reader to realise the long friction which went on, and finally resulted in the unanimity with which publishers and editors turned against Balzac after his famous lawsuit, and showed a vindictive hate which at first sight is surprising. However, in this case the matter ends happily, as the article closes with:

"It ["César Birotteau"] is now merely a work in two volumes, an immense picture, a whole poem, composed, written, and corrected fifteen times in the same number of days—composed in twenty days by M. de Balzac in spite of the printer's office, composed in twenty days by the printer's office in spite of M. de Balzac.

"It is true that at the same time M. de Balzac was employing forty printers at another printing-office. We do not examine here the value of the book. It was made marvellously and marvellously quickly. Whatever it is, it can only be a chef d'œuvre!"

CHAPTER VII

1832

Crisis in Balzac's private life—"Contes Drôlatiques"—Madame Hanska's life before she met Balzac—Description of her appearance—"Louis Lambert"—Disinterested conduct on the part of Madame de Berny—Relations between Balzac and his mother—Balzac and the Marquise de Castries—His despair.

THE year 1832 was a crisis and a turning-point in the history of Balzac's private life.

Old relations changed their aspect; he received a terrible and mortifying wound to his heart and to his vanity; and while he staggered under this blow, a new interest, not in the beginning absorbing, but destined in time to engulf all others, crept at first almost unnoticed into his life.

He was now thirty-three years old; it was time that he should perform the duty of a French citizen and should settle down and marry; and as a preliminary, it seemed necessary that Madame de Berny should no longer continue to occupy her predominant place in his life. She was, as we know, twenty-two years older than he, and was a woman capable not only of romantic attachment, but also of the most disinterested conduct where her affections were concerned. She saw clearly that, having formed Balzac, helped him practically, taught him, given him useful introductions—in short, made him—the time had now come when it would be for his good that she should retire partially into the background; and she had the courage to conceive, and the power to make, the sacrifice. He, on his side, felt the idea of the proposed separation keenly, and never forgot all his life what he owed to the "dilecta," or ceased to feel a deep and faithful affection for her. Still, for him there were compensations, which did not exist for the woman who was growing old. He was famous, was on the way to attain his goal; and he was regarded as the champion of misunderstood and misused women. Therefore, as the species has always been a large one, letters poured in upon him from all parts of Europe—England being the exception—letters telling him how exactly he had gauged the circumstances, sentiments, and misfortunes of his unknown correspondents, asking his advice, expressing intense admiration for his writings, and pouring out the inmost feelings and experiences of the writers. The position was intoxicating for the man who, a few years before, had been unknown and disregarded; and the fact that Balzac never forgot his old friendships in the excitement of the adulation lavished upon him, is a proof that his own belief in the real steadfastness of his character was not mistaken.

Among these unknown correspondents, there were two who specially interested him. One of these was the Marquise de Castries, who, though rather under a cloud at this time, was one of the most aristocratic stars of the Faubourg Saint-Germain, and sister-in-law to the Duc de Fitz-James, with whom Balzac was already connected in several literary undertakings.

As we have already seen, she wrote anonymously towards the end of September, 1831, to complain of the moral tone of the "Physiologie du Mariage" and of "La Peau de Chagrin." In Balzac's reply, which was despatched on February 28th, 1832, he thanked her for the proof of confidence she had shown in making herself known to him, and in wishing for his acquaintance; and said that he looked forward to many hours spent in her society, hours during which he would not need to pose as an artist or literary man, but could simply be himself.*

Separated from her husband, and a most accomplished coquette, the Marquise was recovering from a serious love-affair, when she summoned Balzac to afford her amusement and distraction. Delicate and fragile, her face was rather too long for perfect beauty, but there was something spiritual and slender about it, which recalled the faces of the Middle Ages. Her health had been shattered by a hunting accident, and her expression was habitually one of smiling melancholy and of hidden suffering. Her beautiful Venetian red hair grew above a high white forehead; and in addition to the attractiveness of her elegant svelte figure,

* "Correspondance," vol. i., p. 141.

she possessed in the highest degree the all-powerful seductive influence which we call "charm."

Reclining gracefully in a long chair, she received her intimates in a small simple drawing-room furnished in old-fashioned style, with cushions of ancient velvet and eighteenth-century screens—a room instinct with the aristocratic aroma of the Faubourg Saint-Germain. There Balzac went eagerly during the spring of 1832, and imbibed the strange old-world atmosphere of the exclusive Faubourg, of which he has given a masterly picture in the "Duchesse de Langeais." In this he shows that by reason of its selfishness, its divisions, and want of patriotism and large-mindedness, the Faubourg Saint-Germain had abrogated the proud position it might have held, and was now an obsolete institution, aloof and cornered, wasting its powers on frivolity and the worship of etiquette. At first, gratified vanity at his selection as an intimate by so great a lady, and pleasure at the opportunity given him for the study of what was separated from the ordinary world by an impassable barrier, were Balzac's chief inducements for frequent visits to the Rue de Varenne. Gradually, however, the caressing tones of Madame de Castries' voice, the quiet grace of her language, and her infinite variety, found their way to his heart, and he fell madly in love.

Speaking of her afterwards in the "Duchesse de Langeais," which was written in the utmost bittere . when he had been, according to h's ow 'ew, led on, played with and deceived by the fascinating Marquise, Balzac describes her thus: She was "eminently a woman, and essentially a coquette, Parisian to the core, loving the brilliancy of the world and its amusements, reflecting not at all, or reflecting too late; of a natural imprudence which rose at times almost to poetic heights, deliciously insolent, yet humble in the depths of her heart, asserting strength like a reed erect, but, like the reed, ready to bend beneath a firm hand; talking much of religion, not loving it, and yet prepared to accept it as a possible finality."

In the same book are several interesting remarks about Armand de Montriveau, the lover of the Duchesse de Langeais, who is, in many points, Balzac under another name. On one page we read: "He seemed to have reached some crisis in his life, but all took place within his own breast, and he confided nothing to the world without." In another place is a description of Montriveau's appearance. "His head, which was large and square, had the characteristic trait of an abundant mass of black hair, which surrounded his face in a way that recalled General Kléber, whom indeed he also resembled in the vigour of his bearing, the shape of his face, the tranquil courage of his eye, and the expression of inward ardour which shone out through his strong features. He was of medium height, broad in the chest, and muscular as a lion. When he walked, his carriage, his step, his least gesture, bespoke a consciousness of power which was imposing; there was something even despotic about it. He seemed aware that nothing could oppose his will; possibly because he willed only that which was right. Nevertheless, he was, like all really strong men, gentle in speech, simple in manner, and naturally kind." Certainly Balzac, as usual, did not err on the side of modesty!

Curiously enough, the very day—February 28th, 1832—on which Balzac wrote to accept the offer of the Marquise de Castries' friendship, was the day that the first letter from L'Étrangère reached him. At first sight there was nothing to distinguish this most momentous letter from others which came to him by almost every post, or to indicate that it was destined to change the whole current of his life. It was sent by an unknown woman, and the object of the writer was, while expressing intense admiration for Balzac's work, to criticise the view of the feminine sex taken by him in "La Peau de Chagrin." His correspondent begged him to renounce ironical portrayals of woman, which denied the pure and noble rôle destined for her by Heaven, and to return to the lofty ideal of the sex depicted in "Scènes de la Vie Privée."

This letter, which was addressed to Balzac to the care of Gosselin, the publisher of "La Peau de Chagrin," has never been found. There must have been something remarkable about the wording and tone of it; as Balzac received many such effusions, but was so much impressed by this one, and by the communications which followed, that he decided to dedicate "L'Expiation" to his unknown correspondent. This story he was writing when he received her first letter, and it formed part of the enlarged edition of the "Scènes de la Vie Privée" which was published in May, 1832. On communicating this project, however, to Madame de Berny, she strongly objected to the offer of this extraordinary honour to "L'Étrangère"; and now doubly obedient to her wishes, and anxious not to hurt her feelings, he abandoned the idea after the book had been printed. In January, 1833, in his first letter to Madame Hanska, he explained the matter at length, and sent her a copy which had not been altered, and which had her seal on the title-page. The book sent her has disappeared; but examining some copies of the second edition of the "Scènes," the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul found that a page had been glued against the binding, and, detaching this carefully, discovered the design of the wax seal, and the dedication "Diis ignotis, 28th February, 1832," * the date on which Balzac received the first letter from "L'Étrangère."

This letter gave Balzac many delightful hours, as, when he was able to write to her, he explained to Madame Hanska. In his pride and satisfaction, he showed it to many friends, Madame Carraud being among the number; but she, with her usual rather provoking common-sense, refused to share his enthusiasm, and suggested that it might have been written as a practical joke. To this insinuation Balzac gave no credence; he naturally found it easy to believe in one more enthusiastic foreign admirer, and he was seriously troubled by the fact that the first dizain of the "Contes Drôlatiques," which certainly would not satisfy his correspondent's views on the lofty mission of womanhood, was likely to appear shortly. However, whether she did not read the first dizain of the "Contes," which appeared in April, 1832, or whether the perusal of them showed her more strongly than before that Balzac was really in need of good advice, Madame Hanska did not show her displeasure by breaking off her correspondence with him. Balzac had much to occupy his mind in 1832, as he was conscientiously, though not successfully, trying to make himself agreeable to the lady selected as his wife by his family. At the same time, while with regret and trouble in his heart he tried to relegate Madame de Berny to the position of an ordinary friend, and felt the delightful agitation, followed by bitter mortification, of his intercourse with Madame de Castries, we must remember that from time to time he received a flowery epistle from Russia, written in the turgid and rather bombastic style peculiar to Madame Hanska.

* I have seen this.

On the other hand, we can imagine the interest and excitement felt by the Châtelaine of Wierzchownia as she wrote, and secretly dispatched to the well-known author, the sentimental outpourings of her soul. The composition of these letters must certainly have supplied a savour to a rather flavourless life; for it was dull in that far-off château in Ukraine, which, as Balzac described it afterwards, was as large as the Louvre, and was surrounded by territories as extensive as a French Department. There were actually a carcel lamp and a hospital—which seem a curious conjunction—on the estate, and there were looking-glasses ten feet high in the rooms, but no hangings on the walls. Possibly Madame Hanska did not miss these, but what she did miss was society. She, M. de Hanski,* Anna's governess, Mlle. Henriette Borel, and last, but not least, the beloved Anna herself, the only child, on whom Madame Hanska lavished the most passionate love, were a small party in the château; and besides two Polish relations, Mlles Denise and Séverine Wylezynska, who generally inhabited the summer-house, christened by Balzac "La Demoiselliére," they were the only civilised people in the midst of a huge waste populated by peasants. M. de Hanski often suffered from "blue devils," which did not make him a cheerful companion; and when Madame Hanska had performed a few graceful duties, as châtelaine to the poor of the neighbourhood, there was no occupation left except reading or writing letters. She was an intelligent and intellectual woman; and Balzac's novels, not at first fully appreciated in France because of their deficiencies in style, were eagerly seized on in Germany, Austria, and Russia. She read them with delight; and her natural desire for action, her longing also to pour out, herself unknown, the secret aspirations and yearnings of her heart to some one who would understand her, prompted the first letter; which, according to M. de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, was dictated by her to Anna's governess, Mlle. Henriette Borel. So she started lightly on the road which was to lead her, the leisured and elegant great lady suffering only from ennui, to the period of her life during which she would toil hour after hour at writing, would be overwhelmed by business, pestered by duns and creditors, overworked, overburdened, and overworried. She was certainly not very fortunate, for she seems never to have experienced the passionate love which might have made up for everything.

* Balzac invariably talks of M. de Hanski and Madame Hanska, as do other contemporary writers.

Till the time when she first put herself into communication with Balzac, her life had not been cheerful. A member of a Polish great family, the Countess Eve Rzewuska was born at the Château of Pohrbyszcze on January 25th, 1804 or 1806. She was one of a large family, having three brothers and three sisters, nearly all of whom played distinguished parts in France or Russia; and her eldest brother, Count Henry Rzewuski, was one of the most popular writers of Poland. In 1818 or 1822 she married the rich M. Vencelas de Hanski, who was twenty-five years her senior, an old gentleman of limited mind; pompous, unsociable, and often depressed; but apparently fond of his wife, and willing to allow her the travelling and society which he did not himself care for. Madame Hanska had many troubles in her married life, as she lost four out of her five children; and being an intensely maternal woman, the deepest feelings of her heart were henceforward devoted to Anna, her only surviving child, whom she never left for a day till the marriage of her darling in 1846, and of whom, after the separation, she could not think without tears.

She was a distinctly different type from the gentle, devoted Madame de Berny, whose French attributes were modified by the sentiment and romance she inherited from her Teutonic ancestors; or from Madame de Castries, the fragile and brilliant coquette. Mentally and physically there was a certain massiveness in Madame Hanska which was absent in her rivals. She was characterised by an egoism and self-assertiveness unknown to the "dilecta"; while, on the other hand, her principles were too strong to allow her to use a man as her plaything, as Madame de Castries had no scruple in doing. Side by side with her tendency to mysticism, she possessed much practical ability, a capacity for taking the initiative in the affairs of life, as well as considerable literary and critical power. Balzac had enormous respect for her intellect, and references to the splendid "analytical" forehead, which must have been a striking feature in her face, occur as often in his letters as admiring allusions to her pretty dimpled hands, or playful jokes about her droll French pronunciation. Her miniature by Daffinger,* taken in the prime of her beauty, gives an idea of great energy, strength of will, and intelligence. She is dark, with a decided mouth, and rather thick lips as red as a child's. Her hair is black, and is plainly braided at each side of her forehead; her eyes are dark and profound, though with the vague look of short sight; and her arms and shoulders are beautiful. Altogether she is a handsome woman, though there are indications of that tendency to embonpoint about which she was always troubled, and which Balzac, with his usual love of prescribing for his friends, advised her to combat by daily exercise.

However, in the spring of 1832, the time which we are considering, Madame Hanska was not even a name to Balzac; she was merely "L'Étrangère," an unknown woman who might be pretty or ugly, young or old; but who at any rate possessed the knack—or perhaps the author of "Séraphita" or of "Louis Lambert" would have said the power by transmutation of thought and sympathy—of interesting him in the highest degree.

In June, with the hope that absence would loosen the bonds of affection which united him and Madame de Berny, and with an arrière pensée about another charming personality whom he might meet on his travels, Balzac left Paris for six months, and began his tour by paying a visit to M. de Margonne at Saché. There he wrote "Louis Lambert" as a last farewell to Madame de Berny; and in memory of his ten years' intimacy with her, on the title-page were the dates 1822 and 1832, and underneath the words "Et nunc et semper." The manuscript was sent to her for criticism, and she wrote a charming letter* on receipt of it to Angoulême, where Balzac was staying with Madame Carraud. In this she shows the utmost tenderness and gentle playfulness; but while modestly deprecating her power to perform the task he demands from her, which she says should be entrusted to Madame Carraud, she has the noble disinterestedness to point out to him where she considers he has erred. She tells him that, after reading the book through twice, and endeavouring to see it as a whole, she thinks he has undertaken an impossible task, and that, trying to represent absolute truth in its action, he has attempted what is the province of God alone. Then, with the utmost tact and delicacy, she touches on a difficult point, and says that when Goethe and Byron attempt to paint the aspirations of a superior being, we admire their breadth of view, and wish we could aid them with our minds to reach the unattainable; but that an author who announces that he has swept to the utmost range of thought shocks us by his vanity, and she begs Balzac to eliminate certain phrases in his book which sound as though he had this belief. She finishes thus: "Manage, my dear one, that every one shall see you from everywhere by the height at which you have placed yourself, but do not claim their admiration, for from all parts strong magnifying-glasses will be turned on you; and what becomes of the most delightful object when seen through a microscope?" Loving Balzac so tenderly, growing old so quickly, with Madame de Castries and the unknown Russian ready to seize the empire which she had abdicated willingly, though at bitter cost, what a temptation it must have been to leave these words unsaid, and now that she was parting from Balzac to accord him the unstinted admiration for which he yearned! That Madame de Berny thought of him only, of herself not at all, speaks volumes for the nobility and purity of her love, and we again feel that the "predilecta" never rose to her heights, and that to his first love belongs the credit of "creating" Balzac.

* In the possession of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

* See "La Jeunesse de Balzac," by MM. Hanotaux and Vicaire, p. 74.

During Balzac's absence from Paris, Madame de Balzac, who was installed in his rooms in the Rue Cassini, appears in quite a new light, and one which leads to the suspicion that the much-abused lady was not quite as black as she had been painted. The hard and heartless mother is now transmogrified into the patient and indefatigable runner of errands; and we must admire the business capacity, as well as bodily strength, which Madame de Balzac showed in carrying out her son's various behests. In one letter alone she was enjoined to carry out the following directions*: (1) She was to copy out an article in the Silhouette, which she would find on the second shelf for quartos near the door in Balzac's room. (2) She was to send him her copy of "Contes Drôlatiques," and also "Les Chouans," which she would receive corrected from Madame de Berny. Furthermore, she was told to dress in her best and go to the library, taking with her the third and fourth volumes of "Scènes de la Vie Privée," as a present to M. de Manne, the librarian. She was then to hunt in the "Biographie Universelle" under B or P for Bernard Palissy, read the article, make a note of all books mentioned in it as written by him or about him, and ask M. de Manne for them. Next, Laure was to be visited, as the "Biographie," which had formerly belonged to old M. de Balzac, was at her house; and the works on Palissy mentioned in that must be compared carefully with those already noted down; and if fresh names were found, another visit must be paid to the librarian. If he did not possess all the books and they were not very dear, they were to be bought. A visit to Gosselin was to be the next excursion for poor Madame de Balzac, who apparently walked everywhere to save hackney carriage fares; and as minor matters

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 153.

she must send a letter he enclosed to its destination, and see that the groom exercised the horses every day.

Certainly, if Balzac worked like a galley slave himself, he also kept his relations well employed; but Madame de Balzac apparently did everything contentedly, in the hope, as a good business woman, that the debts would at last be paid off; and though there were occasional breezes, the relations between her and her son were cordial at this time. Possibly she was pleased at his removal from the influence of Madame de Berny, of whom she was always jealous; and certainly she was delighted at the idea of his marriage. The intended daughter-in-law, whose name is never mentioned, was evidently a widow with a fortune, so the affair was highly satisfactory. The lady was expected to pay a visit to Méré, near Saché; and Balzac felt obliged to go there three times a week to see whether she had arrived—a duty which interfered sadly with his work. If he seemed likely to prosper in his suit, she was to be impressed by the sight of his groom and horses. However, this matrimonial business transaction was not successful, as we hear nothing more of it, and the next direction his mother receives is to the effect that she had better sell all his stable equipage.

Whether Madame de Balzac resented these demands made on her, or whether she was disgusted at Balzac's failure to secure a rich wife, and thus to put an end to the family troubles, we do not know; but when he returned to Paris at the end of the year, to his great disappointment she refused to live with him, and left him alone when he sorely needed sympathy and consolation.

It is curiously characteristic of Balzac, that at this very time, when in secret he contemplates marriage, he writes to Madame Carraud that he is going to Aix to run after some one who will perhaps laugh at him—one of those aristocratic women she would no doubt hold in abhorrence: "An angel beauty in whom one imagines a beautiful soul, a true duchess, very disdainful, very loving, delicate, witty, a coquette, a novelty to me! One of those phenomena who efface themselves from time to time, and who says she loves me, who wishes to keep me with her in a palace at Venice (for I tell you everything)—who wishes that I shall in future write only for her, one of those women one must worship on one's knees if she desires it, and whom one has the utmost pleasure in conquering—a dream woman! Jealous of everything! Ah, it would be better to be at Angoulême at the Poudrerie, very sensible, very quiet, listening to the mills working, making oneself sticky with truffles, learning from you how to pocket a billiard-ball, laughing and talking, than to lose both time and life!" *

After his stay at Saché, Balzac went on to the Poudrerie, where he became ill from overwork, francs more awaiting him at Lyons. There he arrived on the 25th, having unfortunately fallen in mounting the imperial of the diligence, and grazed his shin against the footboard, thus making a small hole in the bone. However, we can appreciate the excellent reasons which led him to the conclusion that, in spite of the inflammation in his leg, it would be wise to press on at once to Aix. When he arrived there, on August 26th, he was evidently rewarded by a very cordial greeting from the Marquise; as, the day after, he wrote a most affectionate and joyful letter to his mother, thanking her in the warmest terms for all she had done, and for the pleasure she had procured him by enabling him to take this journey.

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 161.

He was now established in a simple little room, with a view over the lovely valley of the Lac du Bourget; he got up each morning at half-past five, and worked from then till half-past five in the evening, his déjeûner being sent in from the club, and Madame de Castries providing him with excellent coffee, that primary necessity of his existence. At six he dined with her, and they spent the evening till eleven o'clock together. It was an exciting drama that went on during those long tête-à-têtes. On one side was the accomplished coquette, possibly only determined to make a plaything of the man of genius, to charm him and keep him at her feet; or perhaps with a lurking hope that her skilful game would turn to earnestness, and that in the course of it she would manage to forget that charming young Metternich who died at Florence and left her inconsolable. On the other was Balzac, his senses bewildered by passionate love, but his acuteness and knowledge of human nature not allowing him to be altogether deceived; so that he writes to Madame Carraud: "She is the most delicate type of woman—Madame de Beauséant, only better; but are not all these pretty manners exercised at the expense of the heart?"* Nevertheless, these were only passing doubts: he could not really believe that she would behave as she was doing if there were no love for him in her heart, and he pursued his suit with the intense ardour natural to him. Occasionally she became alarmed, and tried to rebuff him by a cold, irritable manner; but he continued to treat her with the utmost gentleness. No doubt, she was not altogether without feeling: an absolutely cold woman could not have exercised dominion over a man of the stamp of Balzac; and though she is always represented as playing a game, probably there were agitations, doubts, questionings, and possibly real trouble, on her side, as well as on that of Balzac. At any rate, the admirer of his novels

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 195.

Balzac, who spoke of the "douleurs qui font trop vivre," plunged very deeply into the learning of the school of life at this time.

At last came a final rupture, of which we can only conjecture the cause, as no satisfactory explanation is forthcoming. The original "Confession" in the "Médecin de Campagne," which is the history of Balzac's relations and parting with Madame de Castries, is in the possession of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul. The present Confession was substituted in its place, because the first revealed too much of Balzac's private life. However, even in the original Confession, we learn no reason for Madame de Castries' sudden resolve to dismiss her adorer, as Balzac declares with indignant despair that he can give no explanation of it. Apparently she parted from him one evening with her usual warmth of affection, and next morning everything was changed, and she treated him with the utmost coldness.

Madame de Castries, with her brother-in-law, the Duc de Fitz-James and his family, had settled to leave Aix on October 10th, and to travel in Italy, visiting Rome and Naples; and they had been anxious that Balzac should be one of the party. At first Balzac only spoke of this vaguely, because of the question of money; but as pecuniary matters were never allowed to interfere with anything he really wanted to do, his mother cannot have been surprised to receive a letter written on September 23rd, telling her that the matter was settled, and that he was going to Italy.* As she would naturally ask how this was to be managed, he explains that he will put off paying a debt of 500 francs, and that, being only responsible for a fourth share in the hire of Madame de Castries' carriage, this money will suffice for his expenses as far as Rome. There he will require 500 francs, and the same amount again at Naples; but this money will be gained by the "Médecin de Campagne," and he will only ask Madame de Balzac for 500 francs—without which he will perhaps, after all, manage—to bring him back from Naples in March. On September 30th he writes to M. Mame, the publisher, to tell him about the nearly-finished "Médecin de Campagne," and still talks of his projected journey; but on October 9th, as a result of Madame de Castries' behaviour towards him, he has left her at Aix, and is himself at Annecy, and on October 16th he has travelled on to Geneva. His only explanation for his sudden change of plan is a vague remark to his mother about the 1,000 francs required for the journey,† and about the difficulty of publishing books while he is away from France; while on the real reason of his change of plan he is absolutely silent. Before the end of 1832 he is back in Paris, and in spite of his success and celebrity is probably passing through the bitterest months of his life.

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 202.

† Ibid., vol. i. p. 220.

CHAPTER VIII

1832—1835

Advertisement in the Quotidienne—Letters between Balzac and Madame Hanska—His growing attachment to her—Meeting at Neufchâtel—Return to Paris—Work—"Études de Mœurs au XIXième Siècle"—"Le Médecin de Campagne"—"Eugénie Grandet"—Meets Madame Hanska at Vienna—"La Duchesse de Langeais"—Balzac's enormous power of work—"La Recherche de l'Absolu"—"Le Père Goriot"—Vienna—Monetary difficulties—Republishes romantic novels—Continual debt—Amusements.

MEANWHILE, during the tragic drama of the downfall of poor Balzac's high hopes, Madame Hanska continued to write steadily; but she was becoming tired of receiving no answer to her letters, and of not even knowing whether or no they had reached their destination. Therefore she wrote on November 7th, 1832, to ask Balzac for a little message in the Quotidienne, which she took in regularly, to say that he had received her letters; and Balzac, in reply, inserted the following notice in the Quotidienne of December 9th, 1832. "M. de B. has received the message sent him; he can only to-day give information of this through a newspaper, and regrets that he does not know where to address his answer. To L'E.—H. de B." *

After this, it is amusing to see that Balzac was

* A copy of the Quotidienne with this advertisement is in the possession of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, and I have seen it.

most particular in impressing on his publishers the necessity of advertising his forthcoming works in the Quotidienne, one of the few French papers allowed admission into Russia. On the other hand, the receipt of the Quotidienne with this announcement made Madame Hanska so bold, that in a letter dated January 9th, 1833, she gave Balzac the welcome information that she and M. de Hanski were leaving Ukraine for a time, and coming nearer France; and that she would indicate to him some way of corresponding with her secretly. As this is the last of her letters that can be found, we do not know what method she pointed out to Balzac; but his first letter to her is dated January, 1833, and after their meeting at Neufchâtel in September, he wrote a short account of his day every evening to his beloved one, and once in eight days he despatched this journal to its destination. As he kept to this plan with only occasional interruptions whenever he was absent from her, till his marriage four months before his death, these letters, some of which are published in a volume called "Lettres à l'Étrangère," form a most valuable record of his life. In one of the first, it is interesting to see that he is obliged to soothe her uneasiness at the strange variety of his handwritings, as Madame Carraud had answered one of her letters in his name; and to allay her suspicions, he makes the rather unlikely explanation, that he has as many writings as there are days in the year. In the future, however, her letters are sacred, no eye but his own being permitted to gaze on them; and with his usual reticence where his feelings are seriously involved, he ceases to mention to his friends his correspondent in far Ukraine.

A little later he comments with joy on the fact that Madame Hanska has sent him a copy of the "Imitation of Christ," * which represents our Lord on the cross, just as he is writing "Le Médecin de Campagne," which portrays the bearing of the cross by resignation, and love, faith in the future, and the spreading around of the perfume of good deeds. To Balzac, believer in the power of the transmission of thought, this coincidence was of good augury.

All this time he has not forgotten Madame de Berny, or the faithless Madame de Castries; and is profoundly miserable. On January 1st, 1833, he writes to his faithful friend, Madame Carraud, to pour out his troubles, and says: "In vain I try to transfer my life to my brain; nature has given me too much heart, and in spite of everything, more than enough for ten men is left. Therefore I suffer. All the more because chance made me know happiness in all its moral extent, while depriving me of sensual beauty. She" (Madame de Berny) "gave me a true love which must finish. This is horrible! I go through troubles and tempests which no one knows of. I have no distractions. Nothing refreshes this heat, which spreads and will perhaps devour me." He then passes on to Madame de Castries, and continues: "An unheard-of coldness has succeeded gradually to what I thought was passion, in a woman who came to me rather nobly." * In a letter to Madame Hanska, speaking of Madame de Castries, though he does not name her, he says: "She causes me suffering, but I do not judge her. Only I think that if you loved someone, if you had drawn him every day towards you into heaven, and you were free, you would not leave him alone in the depths of an abyss of cold, after having warmed him with the fire of your soul." †

* "Lettres à l Étrangère."

Gradually, however, the new love gained ground; though at first Balzac showed that nervous dread of repetition of pain which was, in a man of his buoyancy and self-confidence, the last expression of depression and disillusionment. "I trembled in writing to you. I said to myself: 'Will this be only a new bitterness? Will the skies open to me again, for me only to be driven from them?'" † Nevertheless, passages such as the following, even taking into account the sentimental tone Balzac always adopted to his female correspondents, show that he was not destined to remain permanently inconsolable. "I love you, unknown, and this strange thing is the natural effect of an empty and unhappy life, only filled with ideas, and

* Letters sent by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul to the Revue Bleue of November 21st, 1903.

† "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

the misfortunes of which I have diminished by chimerical pleasures."*

In these words he himself gives the explanation of his overmastering love for Madame Hanska, a love which seems to have puzzled his contemporaries and some of his subsequent biographers. The man with the passionate nature, who cried in his youth for the satisfaction of his two immense desires—to be celebrated and to be loved—soon found the emptiness of the life of fame alone; and Madame Hanska, dowered with all that he longed for, came into his life at the psychological moment when he had broken with the old love, born into the world too soon, and had suffered bitterly at the cruel hands of the new. He turned to her with a rapture of new hope in the glories that might rise for him; and through trouble, disappointment and delay, he never once wavered in his allegiance.

In the early spring of 1833, the Hanski family, after no doubt many preparations, and surrounded by a great paraphernalia—for travelling in those days was a serious matter—started on the journey about which Madame Hanska had already told Balzac. Neufchâtel was their destination; and through Mlle Henriette Borel, Anna's governess, who was a native of the place, and Madame Hanska's confidante, the Villa Andrié, in the Faubourg, just opposite the Hôtel du Faubourg, was secured for them. Mlle Borel was a

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

told* that she was so much struck by the solemnities at M. de Hanski's funeral—the lights, the songs, and the national costumes—that she decided to abjure the Protestant faith, and that in 1843 she took the veil. We may wonder however, whether tardy remorse for her deceit towards the dead man, who had treated her with kindness, had not its influence in causing this sudden religious enthusiasm, and whether the Sister in the Convent of the Visitation in Paris gave herself extra penance for her sins of connivance.

From Neufchâtel, Madame Hanska sent Balzac her exact address; and as he had really settled to go to Besançon in his search for inexpensive paper to enable him to carry out his grand scheme for an universal cheap library, it was settled that, travelling ostensibly for this purpose, he should go for a few days to Neufchâtel, and meet Madame Hanska. He therefore wrote to Charles de Bernard, at Besançon, to ask him to take a place for him in the diligence to Neufchâtel, on September 25th, 1835; and it is easy to imagine his qualms of anxiety, and yet joyful excitement, when he left Paris on the 22nd, and started on his fateful journey. At Neufchâtel, he went to the Hôtel du Faucon,* in the centre of the town, but found a note begging him to be on the Promenade du Faubourg next day from one to four; and he at once removed to the Hôtel du Faubourg, so that he might be near the Villa Andrié. Madame Hanska no doubt shared to a certain extent his tremors of anticipation; but as a beauty and great lady she would naturally feel more confident than Balzac—especially when she had donned with care her most elegant and becoming toilette, and felt armed at every point for the encounter.

* "Balzac à Neufchâtel," by M. Bachelin.

The Promenade du Faubourg at Neufchâtel overlooks the lake, and is terminated by a promontory known as the Crêt, a splendid point of vantage, whence there is a view of the Villa Andrié and over the gardens of the Hôtel du Faubourg. Here, on the afternoon of September 26th, 1833, among other strollers, were two who might have seemed to an observant eye to be waiting for somebody: one was a stout, inelegant little man, with something bizarre about his costume, and the other a dark, handsome lady, dressed in the height of fashion, and perhaps known to some of the loungers as the rich Russian Countess. The manner of their meeting is uncertain; but whether Madame Hanska, with one of Balzac's novels in her hand, recognised him at once and rushed towards him joyously, kiss under the shade of a great oak in the Val de Travers, and swore to wait for each other; and he speaks rapturously of Madame Hanska's beautiful black hair, of her fine dark skin and her pretty little hands. He mentions, too, her colossal riches, though these do not of course count beside her personal charms; but the remark is characteristic, and Balzac's pride and exultation are very apparent.† At last he has found his "grande dame," endowed with youth, beauty and riches, one who would not be ashamed to live with him in a garret, and yet would, by her birth, be able to hold her own in the most exclusive society in the world.

* "Un Roman d'Amour," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, p. 75.

He is specially pleased, too, that he has succeeded in charming Madame Hanska's husband, to whom he was apparently introduced at once, though we do not know by what means. Certainly M. de Hanski appears to have felt a warm liking for the great writer, who charmed him and made him laugh by his amusing talk, kept his blue devils at bay, sent him first copies of his books, and sympathised with his views on political matters. M. de Hanski was also much flattered by Balzac's friendship for his wife, and would finish a polite and stilted epistle by saying that he need trouble Balzac no more, as he knows his wife is at the same time writing him one of her long chattering letters. Even when, by sad mischance, two of Balzac's love-letters fell into M. de Hanski's hands, and the great writer was forced to stoop to the pretence that they were written in jest, the husband seems to have accepted the explanation, and not to have troubled further about the matter. Later on, he sent Balzac a magnificent inkstand as a present, which, the recipient rather ungratefully remarked required palatial surroundings, and was too grand for his use.

* "Un Roman d'Amour," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, p. 75.

† I have seen in M. de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul's collection, the autograph of the whole of this letter as quoted in the "Roman d'Amour,"

On October 1st, the happy time at Neufchâtel came to an end, as the Hanskis were leaving that day, and Balzac's work awaited him in Paris. He got up at five o'clock on the morning of his departure, and went on to the promontory, whence he could gaze at the Villa Andrié, in the vain hope of a last meeting with Madame Hanska; but to his disappointment the Villa was absolutely quiet, no one was stirring. He had a most uncomfortable journey back, for everything was so crowded that fifteen or sixteen intending passengers were refused at each town; and as Charles de Bernard had not been able to secure a place for him in the mail coach, he was obliged to travel in the imperial of the diligence with five Swiss, who treated him scenery, which is after all only Madame Hanska under another name; but he is absolutely discreet, and never speaks of the lady herself. He is redoubling his work, on the chance of managing to pay her another visit. "For a month longer, prodigies of work, to enable me to see you. You are in all my thoughts, in all the lines that I shall trace, in all the moments of my life, in all my being, in my hair which grows for you." *

Fortunately the long years of waiting, the anxieties, the hope constantly deferred, the pangs of unequally matched affection, and at last the short and imperfect fruition, were hidden from him. Henceforward everything in his life refers to Madame Hanska, and he waits patiently for his hoped-for union with her. His deference to his absent friend, his fear of her disapproval, his admiration for her perfections, are half pathetic and half comical.

Though she does not appear to have been strait-laced in her reading, he is terribly afraid of falling in her estimation by what he writes, and he explains anxiously that such books as "Le Médecin de Campagne" or "Séraphita" show him in his true light, and that the "Physiologie du Mariage" is really written in defence of women. The

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

"Contes Drôlatiques" he is also nervous about, and he is much agitated when he hears that she has read some of them without his permission.

He is not always quite candid, and the reader of "Lettres à l'Étrangère" may safely surmise that there is a little picturesque exaggeration in his account of the solitary life he leads; and that Madame Hanska had occasionally good reason for her reproaches at the reports she heard, though Balzac always replies to these complaints with a most touching display of injured innocence. Nevertheless, the "Lettres à l'Étrangère" are the record of a faithful and ever-growing love, and there is much in them which must increase the reader's admiration for Balzac.

The year 1833 was a prosperous one with him, as in October he sold to the publisher, Madame Charles Béchet, for 27,000 francs, an edition of "Études de Mœurs au XIXième Siècle" in twelve octavo volumes, consisting of the third edition of "Scènes de la Vie Privée," the first of "Scènes de la Vie de Province," and the first part of the "Scènes de la Vie Parisienne." The last volume of this edition did not appear till 1837, and before that time Balzac had taken further strides towards his grand conception of the Comédie Humaine. In October, 1834,* he writes to Madame Hanska that the "Études de Mœurs," in which is traced thread by thread the history of the human heart, is only to be the base of the structure; and that next, in the "Études Philosophiques," he will go back from effect to cause, from the feelings, their life and way of working, to the conditions behind them on which life, society, and man have their being; and that having described society, he will in the "Études Philosophiques" judge it. In the "Études de Mœurs" types will be formed from individuals, in the "Études Philosophiques" individuals from types. Then, after effects and causes, will come principles, in the "Études Analytiques." "Les mœurs sont le spectacle, les causes sont les coulisses et les machines, et les principes c'est l'auteur." When this great palace is at last completed, he will write the science of it in "L'Essai sur les Forces Humaines"; and on the base, he, a child and a laugher, will trace the immense arabesque of the "Contes Drôlatiques," those Rabelaisian stories in old French tracing the progress of the language, which he often declared would be his principal claim to fame. In 1842 the name "La Comédie Humaine" was after much consideration given to the whole structure, and in the preface he explains this title by saying: "The vastness of a plan which includes Society's history and criticism, the analysis of its evils, the discussion of its principles, justifies me, I think, in giving to my work the name under which it is appearing to-day—'The Human Comedy.' Pretentious, is it? Is it not rather true? That is a question for the public to decide when the work is finished."

"* Lettres à l'Étrangère."

Unfortunately, in spite of the fact that in twelve years, from 1830 to 1842, Balzac wrote seventy-nine novels—an enormous number, especially remembering the fact that during the same time he published tales and numberless articles—the great work was never finished; and the last philosophical study, which was to be entitled "The Marquis of Carabbas," and was to treat of the life of nations, was not even begun.

However, in 1833, when he really started the germ of his life-work, he, like his father, had the idea that he would live to an enormous age; and he was in high spirits about the pecuniary side of his transaction with Madame Béchet.

Except for what he owes his mother, in seven months he will be free of debt, he cries rapturously; but it is hardly necessary to mention that this happy time of deliverance never did arrive. Indeed, we are scarcely surprised, when he writes on November 20th, to say that his affairs are in the most deplorable condition; that he has just sent four thousand francs, his last resource, to Mame, the publisher, and is as poor as Job; with one lawsuit going on, and another beginning for which he requires twelve hundred francs. His chronic state of disagreement with Émile de Girardin, editor of La Presse, had at this time, in spite of Madame de Girardin's attempts at mediation, become acute; so that they nearly fought a duel. The year before, as we have already seen, he had quarrelled with his former friend, Amédée Pichot, and had deserted the Revue de Paris, so his business relations were, as usual, not very happy.

However, he was at first much pleased with Madame Béchet, who, with unexpected liberality, herself paid 4000 francs for corrections; and in July, 1834, he got rid of the publisher Gosselin, whom he politely designates as a "nightmare of silliness," and a "rost-beaf ambulant," and started business with Werdet, not yet the "vulture who fed on Prometheus," but an excellent young man, somewhat resembling "l'illustre Gaudissart," full of devotion and energy.

The year 1833 was rich in masterpieces. In September appeared "Le Médecin de Campagne," with its motto, "For wounded souls, shade and silence"; and though, like "Louis Lambert," it was not at first a success, later on its true value was realised; and the hero, the good Dr. Benassis, is one of Balzac's purest and most noble creations. It was followed in December by "Eugénie Grandet," a masterpiece of Dutch genre, immortalised by the vivid vitality of old Grandet, that type of modern miser who, in contradistinction to Molière's Harpagon, enjoyed universal respect and admiration, his fortune being to some people in his province "the object of patriotic pride." The book raised such a storm of enthusiasm, that Balzac became jealous for the fame of his other works, and would cry indignantly: "Those who call me the father of Eugénie Grandet wish to belittle me. It is a masterpiece, I know; but it is a little masterpiece; they are very careful not to me[illegible] great ones."* This, which is the best k[illegible] most generally admired of Balzac's nove[illegible] cated by a strange irony of fate to Ma[illegible] identity has never been discovered; the [illegible] really known about her being her pathet[illegible] to Balzac, that he would love her just [illegible] and she would love him for all eternity. [illegible] not, however, have undisputed possessio[illegible] the short time she longed for, as Madame [illegible] all-conquering influence was in the ascend[illegible] as Balzac was always discreet, perhaps p[illegible] was not aware of this.

In the midst of the acclamations and c[illegible] tions on the appearance of "Eugénie G[illegible] Balzac again left Paris, and went to Gene[illegible] he arrived on December 25th, 1833. He [illegible] Paris on February 8th, having spent six [illegible] with the Hanski family. During this [illegible] definite promise was made by Madame H[illegible] that she would marry him if she became a w[illegible] "Adoremus in æternum" was their motto: [illegible] her humble "moujik," and she was his "pre[illegible] his love, his life, his only thought."†

Curiously enough, his occupation in G[illegible] the rapture of his newly-found happiness, w[illegible] write the "Duchesse de Langeais," by whi[illegible] intended to revenge himself on Madame de C[illegible]

* "Balzac, sa Vie et ses Œuvres d'après sa Correspon[illegible] Madame L. Surville.

† "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

igh he could not help, in his book, making her to him at last, when it was too late. The nd was still smarting. He detests and despises he says; and the only words of spitefulness ded in his generous, large-minded life, are n he mentions, with pretended pity, that owing ll-health she has completely lost her beauty.
spite of this outburst, however, we find that he e forward later on, and helped her with much gy when she was in difficulties. He never the satisfaction of knowing whether she were ished or no; as when he showed her the book re it was published, with the ostensible reason wishing through her to disarm the Faubourg Germain, which is severely criticised in its es, she professed much admiration for it.

Meanwhile, Madame de Berny was beginning slow process of dying; and Balzac speaks stantly with trouble of her failing health, and he heart disease from which she suffered, and ch, with her usual unselfishness, she tried to ceal from him. She was too ill now to correct proofs, and her family circumstances were, as have already seen, very miserable; so that her was closing sadly. In January, 1835, Balzac nt eight days with her at La Boulonnière, near mours, working hard all the time; and was rified to find her so ill, that even the pleasure reading his books brought on severe heart acks.

His life at this time was enormously busy; the passion for work had him in its grip, and even his robust constitution suffered from the enormous strain to which he subjected it by his constant abuse of coffee, which caused intense nervous irritation; and by the short hours of sleep he allowed himself. He never rested for a moment, he was never indifferent for a moment, his faculties were constantly on the stretch, and Dr. Nacquart remonstrated in vain. In August, 1834, he was attacked by slight congestion of the brain, and imperatively ordered two months' rest; which, of course, he did not take; and now from time to time, in his letters, occur entries of sinister omen, about symptoms of illness, and doctor's neglected advice. In October "La Recherche de l'Absolu" appeared, and instead of greeting it with the enthusiasm he usually accorded to his books, he remarked to Madame Hanska that he hoped it was good, but that he was too tired to judge. However, by December of the same year, when "Le Père Goriot" was published, he had to a certain extent recovered his elasticity, and said that it was a beautiful work, though terribly sad, and showed the moral corruption of Paris like a disgusting wound. A few days later he became more enthusiastic, and wrote: "You will be very proud of 'Le Père Goriot.' My friends insist that nothing is comparable to it, and that it is above all my other compositions."* Certainly the vivid portrait of old Goriot, that ignoble King Lear, who

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

He was straining every nerve to be able to meet Madame Hanska in Vienna; but with all his efforts his journey was put off month after month, and it was not till May 9th, 1835, that he was at last able to start. He arrived at Vienna on the 16th; having hired a post carriage for the journey, a little extravagance which cost him 15,000 francs. His stay there was not a rest, as, to Madame Hanska's annoyance, he worked twelve hours a day at "Le Lys dans la Vallée," and explained to her that he was doing a good deal in thus sacrificing three hours a day for her sake—fifteen hours out of the twenty-four being his usual time for labour. He visited Munich on his way back, and arrived in Paris on June 11th, to find a crowd of creditors awaiting his arrival, and his pecuniary affairs in terrible confusion. Owing, he considered, to the machinations of his enemies, articles had appeared in different papers announcing that he had been imprisoned for debt—a report which naturally ruined his credit, and caused a general gathering of those to whom he owed money. It was not a pleasant home-coming; as Werdet and Madame Béchet were in utter despair, and reproached Balzac bitterly for his absence, while all his silver had been pawned by his sister to pay his most pressing liabilities.

It is curious about this time to notice the reappearance of the early romantic novels, "Jane la Pâle," "La Dernière Fée," and their fellows.* Balzac, as we have seen, was in terrible straits for money, and he knew that the Belgians, who at this time practised the most shameless piracy, would reprint the books for their own advantage, if he did not. Therefore, in self-defence, he determined to bring out an edition himself; though, as he consistently refused to acknowledge the authorship of these despised productions, the treaty was drawn up in the name of friends. Nevertheless, with his usual caution, he drew up a secret document which was signed by M. Regnault, one of those in whose name the sale to the publisher was arranged, to the effect that the works of the late Horace de Saint-Aubin were really the property of M. de Balzac. "L'Héritière de Birague" and "Jean Louis" did not appear in this edition, probably owing to the intervention of M. Le Poitevin, who considered them partly his property; but they were published with the others in an edition printed in 1853, after a lawsuit between Balzac's widow and his early collaborator.

The condition of the whole Balzac family at the close of 1835 was tragic, M. Henri, back from abroad, and utterly incapable, as Balzac says, of doing anything, talked of blowing out his brains; Madame Surville was ill, Madame Balzac's reason fe was despaired of; and Balzac chose this to consult a somnambulist about Madame ska, and was told the distressing news that she in anxiety of some sort, and that her heart enlarged! Fortunately, in October, 1835, the ski family returned to Wierzchownia, and the tant worry to Balzac of their proximity to ce, was removed for the time.

* "Une Page Perdue de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

December another misfortune befell Balzac. re broke out at the printing office in the Rue Pot-de-Fer, and burnt the first hundred and pages of the third dizain of the "Contes latiques," as well as five hundred volumes of first and second dizain, which had cost him francs each. He thus lost 3,500 francs, to add to the calamity, did not receive the of 6,000 francs which in the ordinary course vents would have been due to him at the end he year, when but for this disaster he would handed over the third dizain to Werdet and associate.

igures and sums of money occur constantly in zac's letters; but his accounts of his pecuniary rs are so conflicting and so complicated that impossible to understand them; indeed it is btful whether he ever mastered them himself, e continually expected to be out of debt in ew months. According to his own story to dame Hanska, he left the printing office owing 000 francs, had to find 6,000 francs a year for rest on this debt, and required 3,000 francs to live on; while in 1828, 1829, and 1830, he only made 3,000 francs each year, so that in three years he had increased his debt by 24,000 francs. In 1830 the Revolution caused general disaster among the publishers, and "La Peau de Chagrin" only made 700 francs, so that in 1830 and 1831 Balzac had an income of only 10,000 francs a year, and had to pay out 18,000 francs. From 1833 to 1836 he received 10,000 francs a year by his treaty with Madame Béchet; 6,000 of this he paid in interest on his debt, while 4,000 apparently remained to live on. However, between the fire in the Rue du Pot-de-Fer, Werdet's delinquencies, the failure of the Chronique, and the sums paid back to publishers who had advanced money on arrangements Balzac cancelled to fulfil this new agreement, hardly anything was left; and in 1837 he owed 162,000 francs.

In August, 1835, he describes his life thus *: "Work, always work! Heated nights succeed heated nights, days of meditation days of meditation; from execution to conception, from conception to execution! Little money compared with what I want, much money compared with production. If each of my books were paid like those of Walter Scott, I should manage; but although well paid, I do not attain my goal. I received 8,000 francs for the 'Lys'; half of this came from the publisher, half from the Revue de Paris. The article in the Conservateur will pay

* "Lettres á l'Étrangère."

3,000 francs. I shall have finished 'Séraphita,' ın 'Les Mémoires de Deux Jeunes Mariées,' finished Mme. Béchet's edition. I do not w whether a brain, pen, and hand will ever re have accomplished such a 'tour de force the help of a bottle of ink."

s it is impossible for even a Balzac to live ıout relaxation, even if he goes without rest, t, may we ask, were his recreations at this time? the first place he often went to the theatre; he was passionately fond of music, occupying ıace in the box at the Italian Opera, which reserved specially for dandies. One of his avagances was a dinner at which he entertained five other "tigres," as the occupants of this box e nicknamed, and Rossini, Olympe Pélissier, lier, Sandeau, and Bohain. At this banquet, most sumptuous fare and the most exquisite es were provided for the guests, and the table decked with the rarest flowers. Balzac en-ed the festivity immensely, as well as the t which followed it; and relates with delight all Paris was talking of it, and that Rossini he had not seen more magnificence when he ed at royal tables.

Iowever busy he was, he never completely de-ed himself of the pleasure of listening to music; ugh on one occasion he remarks regretfully, he has been obliged to limit his attendance the Opera to two visits each month; and on ther, that he has been so overwhelmed with business that he has not been able even to have a bath, or go to the Italian Opera, two things that are more necessary to him than bread. His works abound in references to his beloved art, and when he was writing "Massimilla Doni" he employed a professional musician to instruct him about it. Beethoven, in particular, he speaks of with the utmost enthusiasm, and after hearing his "Symphony in Ut mineur," he says that the great musician is the only person who makes him feel jealous, and that he prefers him even to Rossini and Mozart. "The spirit of the writer," he says, "cannot give such enjoyment, because what we print is finished and determined, whereas Beethoven wafts his audience to the infinite." *

The other amusements of this great thinker and seer would strike the reader as strange, if he did not perhaps, by this time, realise that no anomaly need surprise him in Balzac's extraordinary personality.

He writes to Madame Hanska *: "As to my joys, they are innocent. They consist in new furniture for my room, a cane which makes all Paris chatter, a divine opera-glass, which my workers have had made by the optician at the Observatory; also the gold buttons on my new coat, buttons chiselled by the hand of a fairy, for the man who carries a cane worthy of Louis XIV. in the nineteenth century cannot wear ignoble pinchbeck buttons. These are little innocent toys,

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

ch make me considered a millionaire. I have ted the sect of the 'Cannophiles' in the world fashion, and every one thinks me utterly olous. This amuses me!" Certainly Balzac not wrong when he told his correspondent there was much of the child in him.

CHAPTER IX

NO PARTICULAR DATE

Balzac's portrait as described by Gautier—His character—Belief in magnetism and somnambulism—His attempts to become deputy—His political and religious views.

In the Salon of 1837 appeared a portrait of Balzac by Boulanger,* of which Théophile Gautier gave the following description in La Presse: "M. de Balzac is not precisely beautiful. His features are irregular; he is fat and short. Here is a summary which does not seem to lend itself to a painting, but this is only the reverse of the medal. The life and ardour reflected in the whole face give it a special beauty.

"In his portrait, M. de Balzac, enveloped in the large folds of a monk's habit, sits with his arms crossed, in a calm and strong attitude; the neck is uncovered, the look firm and direct; the light, shining from above, illumines the satin-like smoothness of the upper parts of the forehead, and throws a bright light on the bumps of imagination and humour, which are strongly developed in M. de Balzac; the black hair, also lit up, shining and radiant, comes from the temples in bright waves,

* See the chapter entitled "Un Portrait" in "Autour de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

d gives singular light to the top of the head; eyes steeped in a golden penumbra with tawny eballs, on a moist and blue crystalline lens like at of a child, send out a glance of astonishing uteness; the nose, divided into abrupt polished t places, breathes strongly and passionately, rough large red nostrils; the mouth, large and luptuous, particularly in the lower lip, smiles th a rabelaisian smile under the shade of a oustache much lighter in colour than the hair; d the chin, slightly raised, is attached to the roat by a fold of flesh, ample and strong, which sembles the dewlap of a young bull. The throat self is of athletic and rare strength, the plump ll cheeks are touched with the vermilion of rvous health, and all the flesh tints are re-lendent with the most joyful and reassuring illiancy.

"In this monk's and soldier's head there is a xture of reflection and of good-humour, of solution and of high spirits, which is infinitely e; the thinker and good liver melt into each her with quaint harmony. Put a cuirass on is large breast, and you will have one of those t German foot-soldiers so jovially painted by erburg. With the monk's habit, it is Jean des ıtommeurs*; nevertheless, do not forget that e eyes throw, through all this embonpoint and ood-humour, the yellow look of a lion to counter-t this Flemish familiarity. Such a man would be equal to excesses of the table, of pleasure, and of work. We are no longer astonished at the immense quantity of volumes published by him in so short a time. This prodigious labour has left no trace of fatigue on the strong cheeks dappled with red, and on the large white forehead. The enormous work which would have crushed six ordinary authors under its weight is hardly the third of the monument he wishes to raise."

* One of the characters in Rabelais.

The original of this portrait was sent to Madame Hanska at Wierzchownia; but a sketch of it belongs to M. Alexandre Dumas the younger, and has often been engraved. From this, it seems as though Théophile Gautier must have read his knowledge of Balzac's character as a whole into his interpretation of the picture. To the ordinary observer, Boulanger's portrait represents Balzac as the thinker, worker, and fighter, stern and strenuous; not the delightful comrade who inspired joy and merriment, and the recollection of whom made Heine smile on his death-bed. The wonderful eyes which had not their equal, and which asked questions like a doctor or a priest, are brilliantly portrayed. Balzac himself allows this, though he complains to Madame Hanska that they have more of the psychological expression of the worker than of the loving soul of the individual—a fact for which we may be grateful to Boulanger. Balzac is much delighted, however, with Boulanger's portrayal of the insistence and intrepid faith in the future, à la Coligny or à la Peter the Great, which are at the base of his character; and he goes on to give an attractive, though rather picturesque account of his career and past misfortunes, which is evidently intended to counteract any misgivings Madame Hanska may feel at his sternness as depicted in the portrait.

"Boulanger has seen the writer only,* not the tenderness of the idiot who will always be deceived, not the softness towards other people's troubles which cause all my misfortunes to come from my holding out my hand to weak people who are falling into disaster. In 1827 I help a working printer, and therefore in 1829 find myself crushed by fifty thousand francs of debt, and thrown without bread into a gutter. In 1833, when my pen appears to be likely to bring in enough to pay off my obligations, I attach myself to Werdet. I wish to make him my only publisher, and in my desire to bring him prosperity, I sign engagements, and in 1837 find myself owing a hundred and fifty thousand francs, and liable on this account to be put under arrest, so that I am obliged to hide. During this time I make myself the Don Quixote of the poor. I hope to give courage to Sandeau, and I lose through him four to five thousand francs, which would have saved other people." It would be interesting to hear what Barbier and Werdet would have said, if they had been allowed to read this letter; but on Browning's principle, that a man should show one side to the world, and the other to the woman he loves, no doubt Balzac's account of past events was quite justifiable.

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

Boulanger's picture gave Balzac a great deal of trouble, as well as delighted yet anxious speculation about Madame Hanska's opinion of it, when it arrived in Wierzchownia. This was naturally an important matter, his meetings with her being so rare that, except his letters, the picture would generally be her only reminder of him; and for this reason it was most necessary that it should show him at his best. It was therefore very trying that Boulanger should have exaggerated the character of his quiet strength, and made him look like a bully and a soldier; and we can enter thoroughly into his feelings, and sympathise heartily with his uneasiness, because Boulanger has not quite caught the fineness of contour under the fatness of the face. Undoubtedly, the picture does not give the idea of a person of extreme refinement, or distinction of appearance. Nevertheless, judging from stories told by his contemporaries, and also from some of the books written by the great novelist, it seems likely that Boulanger's powerful and strongly coloured portrait, though only redeemed from coarseness by the intense concentration of expression and the intellectual light in the wonderful eyes, was strikingly true to nature, and caught one very real aspect of the man. Perhaps, however, it was not the one calculated to work most strongly on the feelings of his absent lady-love; who, no doubt, poor Balzac hoped, would often make her way to that spot in the picture gallery where his picture hung in its quaint frame of black velvet, and would refresh herself with the sight of her absent friend. When her miniature by Daffinger was sent him, he was stupefied all day with joy; and he always carried it about with him, considering it an amulet which brought him good fortune.

RODIN'S STATUE OF BALZAC.

EXHIBITED IN PARIS AT L'EXPOSITION DES BEAUX-ARTS IN 1898.

[To face p. 184.

He believed in talismans, and had pretty fanciful ideas about being present to his friends in the sudden flicker of the fire, or the brightening of a candle-flame. Balzac, the Seer, the believer in animal magnetism, in somnambulism, in telepathy, the weaver of strange fancies and impossible day-dreams—Balzac with philosophical theories on the function of thought, and faith in the mystical creed of Swedenborg—in short, the Balzac of "Louis Lambert" and "Séraphita," is not, however, depicted by Boulanger: he can only be found in M. Rodin's wonderful statue. There the great voyant, who, in the beautiful vision entitled "L'Assomption," saw man and woman perfected and brought to their highest development, stands in rapt contemplation and concentration, his head slightly raised, as if listening for the voice of inspiration, or hearing murmurs of mysteries still unfathomed.

Somnambulism, in particular, occupied much of Balzac's attention. He wrote in 1832 to a doctor, M. Chapelain, who evidently shared his interest in the subject, to ask why medical men had not made use of it to discover the cause of cholera *; and on another occasion, after an accident to his leg, he sent M. Chapelain, from Aix, two pieces of flannel which he had worn, and wanted to know from them what caused the mischief, and why the doctors at their last consultation advised a blister. Unluckily, we hear no more of the matter, and never have the satisfaction of learning how much the learned doctor deduced from the fragments submitted to his inspection. Time after time Balzac mentions in his correspondence that he has consulted somnambulists when he has been anxious about the health of the Hanski family; and it is curious that a few months before he received the letter from Madame Hanska, telling of her husband's death, he had visited a sorcerer, who, by means of cards, told him many extraordinary things about his past career, and said that in six weeks he would receive news which would change his whole life.

The portrait was still destined to cause Balzac much anxiety. After the close of the Salon, the painter had promised to take a copy of it for Madame de Balzac, who, "between ourselves," Balzac remarked to Madame Hanska, would not care much about it, and certainly would not know the difference between the replica and the original, in which the soul of the model was searched for, examined and depicted,† and which was, of course, to belong to the beloved friend.

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 147.

† "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

However, there were still many delays. Boulanger showed "horrible ingratitude," and did not appreciate sufficiently the honour done him by his illustrious sitter in allowing his portrait to be taken. He refused at first to begin the copy; but this difficulty was at last arranged, and the original was carefully packed in a wooden crate, instead of going in a roll as Balzac had at first intended. Still there were innumerable stoppages, and doubt where the precious canvas was located; till the impatient Balzac was only deterred from his intention of starting a lawsuit against the authorities, by a fear of bringing the noble name of Hanski into notoriety. It is sad that the last time we hear of this precious picture in Balzac's lifetime was when he went to Wierzchownia, in 1849; and then it had been relegated to a library which few people visited, and he describes it with his usual energy, as the most hideous daub it is possible to see—quite black, from the faulty mixing of the colours; a canvas of which, for the sake of France, he is thoroughly ashamed.

The sketch of the portrait is not disfigured; and the engravings of it give an interesting view of Balzac's personality. With due deference to the great psychologist, we cannot think the painter was wrong in imparting a slightly truculent expression to the face. Balzac was essentially a fighter: he started life with a struggle against his family, against the opinion of his friends, and, harder than all, against his own impotence to give expression to his genius; and, in the course of his career he made countless enemies, and finished by enrolling among their ranks most of the literary men of the day. This alienation was to a great extent caused by his inveterate habit of boasting, of applying the adjectives "sublime" and "magnificent" to his own works: an idiosyncracy which was naturally annoying to his brother authors. It was deprecated even by his devoted and admiring friends; though they knew that, as George Sand says, it was only caused by the naïveté of an artist, to whom his work was all-important.

His personal charm was so great, that Werdet, his enemy, says that in his presence those who loved him, forgot any real or fancied complaint against him, and only remembered the affection they felt for him. Nevertheless, in the course of his life of fighting, his ever-pressing anxieties and the strain of his work, coupled with his belief in the importance and sacredness of his destiny, made him something of an egotist. Therefore, in spite of his real goodness of heart, he would sometimes shoulder his way through the world, oblivious of the unfortunate people who had come to grief owing to their connection with him, and careless of the lesser, though very real troubles of harassed and exasperated editors, when his promised copy was not forthcoming.

Like Napoleon, to whom, amidst the gibes of his contemporaries, he likened himself, he wanted everything; and those with this aspiration must necessarily be heedless of their neighbours' smaller ambitions. "Without genius, I am undone!" he cried in despair; but when it was proved beyond dispute that this gift of debatable beneficence was his, he was still unsatisfied.

What, after all, was the use of genius except as a stepping-stone to the solid good things of the earth? Where lay the advantage of superiority to ordinary men, if it could not be employed as a lever with which to raise oneself? Reasoning thus, his extraordinary versatility, his power of assimilation, and his varied interests, made his ambitions many and diverse. The man who could enter with the masterly familiarity of an expert into affairs of Church, State, Society, and Finance, who would talk of medicine like a doctor, or of science like a savant, naturally aspired to excellence in many directions.

At times, as we have already seen, strange fancies filled his brain: dreams, for instance, of occupying the highest posts in the land, or of gaining fabulous sums of money by some wildly impossible scheme, such as visiting the Great Mogul with a magical ring, or obtaining rubies and emeralds from a rich Dutchman. The two apparently incompatible sides to Balzac's character are difficult to reconcile. On some occasions he appears as the keen business man, who studies facts in their logical sequence, and has the power of drawing up legal documents with no necessary point omitted. The masterly Code which he composed for the use of the "Société des Gens-de-Lettres" is an example of this faculty. At other times we are astonished to find that the great writer is a credulous believer in impossibilities, and a follower of strange superstitions. A similar paradox may be found in his books, where, side by side with a truth and occasional brutality which make him in some respects the forerunner of the realists, we find a wealth of imagination and insistence on the power of the higher emotions, which are completely alien to the school of Flaubert and Zola.

Perhaps his own dictum, that genius is never quite sane, gives a partial explanation of many of his fantastic schemes. The question of money was his great preoccupation and anxiety, and possibly his pecuniary difficulties, and the strain of of the heavy chain of debt he dragged after him, constantly adding to its weight by some fresh extravagance, had affected his mind on this one point. Marriage with poverty he could not conceive; and, as he was intensely affectionate, he longed for a home and womanly companionship. "Is there no woman in the world for me?" he cried despairingly; but in this, as in everything else, he required so much, that it was difficult to find any one who would, in his eyes, be worthy to become Madame Honoré de Balzac. His wife must be no ordinary woman; in addition to birth and wealth, she must possess youth, beauty, and high intellectual gifts; and one great difficulty was, that the lady endowed with this combination of excellencies would naturally require some winning, and Balzac had no time to woo. However, it was absolutely necessary that his married life should be one of luxury and magnificence, beautiful surroundings being indispensable to his scheme of existence, "Il faut," he said, "que l'artiste mène une vie splendide." Therefore, till the right lady was found, Balzac toiled unceasingly; and when in Madame Hanska the personification of his ideal at last appeared, he redoubled his efforts, till overwork, and his longing for her, caused the decay of his physical powers, and his strength for labour diminished.

Literature, a rich marriage, a successful play, or a political career, were all incidentally to make his fortune; though it must be said, in justice, that this motive, though it entwines itself with everything in Balzac's life, was not his only, or even his principal incentive to action.

In his desire to become a deputy, for instance, the longing to serve his country and to have a voice in her Councils, which he would use boldly, conscientiously, without fear or favour, to further her true interests, was ever present with him. As early as 1819, he had begun to take the keenest interest in the elections, telling M. Dablin, from whom he wanted a visit, that he dreamed of nothing but him and the deputies, and begging him for a complete list of those chosen in each department, with a short notice of his opinion on each.

By the law of election of 1830, any Frenchman who was thirty years of age, and contributed 500 francs a year directly, in taxes, was eligible as a deputy. When the law was made Balzac was thirty-one, and paid the requisite amount; he therefore determined, in spite of his enormous output of literary work at this time, to add the career of a deputy to his labours; and in April, 1831, he wrote to ask for the assistance of the Général Baron de Pommereul, with whom he had been staying at Fougères, collecting material for "Les Chouans," while at the same time he worked up the country politically. His manifesto, at this period, is found in the "Enquête sur la Politique des Deux Ministères,"* in which he calls the Government a "monarchie tempéré par les émeutes," objects to the "juste milieu" observed by the Ministers; and while bringing forward, with apparent impartiality, the advantages of the two courses of peace and war, very evidently longs for France to take the battlefield again, to obtain what he considers her natural frontier, that of the Rhine. He also enters con amore into the details of raising a Napoleonic army, and of establishing the system of the Landwehr in France. A very remarkable passage in this manifesto is that on the Press; by which, he says, the Government is terrorised. With extraordinary penetration, he advises that the strength of journalism shall be broken by the sacrifice of the three or four millions gained by the "timbre," and the liberation of the newspapers from duty. Then, instead of twelve newspapers, which are stronger than the seven ministers—for they upset the Government, and cannot be themselves suppressed—there will be a hundred, and the number will neutralise their power, so that they will become of no account politically.

* Another political pamphlet, entitled "Du Gouvernement Moderne," written by Balzac at Aix in 1832, has lately been published in the North American Review. The original is in the collection of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

Balzac had no chance at Fougères, where a rich proprietor of the neighbourhood was chosen as deputy, and no doubt M. de Pommereul advised him not to proceed further in the matter. However, with his usual tenacity, he wrote in September to M. Henri Berthoud, manager of the Gazette de Cambrai, who wanted to collaborate with the Revue de Paris, promising to further his wishes by all the means in his power, if M. Berthoud would, on his part, support his candidature at Cambrai. At the same time, he determined to try Angoulême, where he sometimes went to stay with a relation, M. Grand-Besançon, and had met a M. Bergès, chief of the Government preparatory school, who was much struck by his talent, and promised to help him. In June, 1831, he wrote to Madame Carraud,* who took much interest in his political aspirations, and sent her three copies of the Manifesto for distribution. He told her that he was working day and night to become deputy, was going out into society for this purpose; and was so overwhelmed with business, that he had not touched "La Peau de Chagrin" since he was last at Saint-Cyr.

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 118.

He was evidently full of hope; but in spite of the powerful support of the Revue de Paris, the Temps, the Débats, and the Voleur, the steady-going electors had no mind to be represented by a penniless young author, who was chiefly known to the general public as the writer of the "Physiologie du Mariage," a book distinctly not adapted for family reading. Therefore, in this, as in many other hopes of his life, Balzac was doomed to disappointment; though the readers of novels may be grateful to the unkind fate which caused him to turn with renewed ardour to the neglected "Peau de Chagrin." He cherished a slight resentment against Angoulême, as he showed in "Illusions Perdues," where the aristocracy of that town are rather unkindly treated; but he was not discouraged in his political ambitions, and in 1832 he joined with M. Laurentie, the Duc de Noailles, the Duc de Fitz-James (nephew to the Princesse de Chimay, who acted as proxy for Marie Antoinette at Madame de Berny's christening) and others, to found a Legitimist journal, the Rénovateur. In this appeared an article against the proposed destruction of the monument to the Duc de Berry, in which Balzac indignantly asks: "Why do you not finish the monument, and raise an altar where the priests may pray God to pardon the assassin?"

Having thus shown his principles clearly, he turned his attention in 1832 to Chinon, which was close to Tours, where he and his family had lived for so long, and to Saché, where he was a constant visitor. There, if anywhere, he seemed likely to succeed; and the Quotidienne, the paper which afterwards supported him during his lawsuit against the Revue de Paris, had promised its voice in his favour. Again cruel Fate dogged his footsteps, as in May he tumbled out of his tilbury, and his head came violently into contact with what he calls the "heroic pavements of July"; the accident being a sad result of his childish delight in driving at a tremendous pace in the Bois, which is rebuked by his sage adviser, Madame Carraud. Certainly carriages, horses, and a stable, seemed hardly prudent acquisitions for a man in debt; but Balzac always defended his pet extravagances with the specious reasoning that nothing succeeds like success; and that most of his literary friends did not become rich because they lived in garrets, and were on that account trampled on by haughty publishers and editors. He writes to Madame de Girardin on this occasion: "Only think, that I who am so handsome have been cruelly disfigured for several days, and it has seemed curious to be uglier than I really am." * As a further and more serious result, he was laid up in bed, and had to undergo a severe regimen of bleeding, during the time that he should have been at Saché, working hard about his election; and when he did arrive there, in June, he recognised that he was too late for success. However, another dissolution, which after all did not take place, was expected in September, and Balzac looked forward to making a determined attempt then. This hope being frustrated, it was not till 1834 that he again came forward as a candidate: this time for Villefranche, where, curiously enough, another M. de Balzac was nominated, and when M. de Hanski wrote to congratulate Balzac, the latter was obliged to explain the mistake. On this occasion he had purposed to present himself as champion of the Bourbon Royal Family, especially of the Duchesse de Berry, for whom he had an immense admiration, while she read his books with much delight during her captivity in the Castle of Blaye. He wrote to M. de Hanski that he considered the exile of Madame and the Comte de Chambord the great blot on France in the nineteenth century, as the French Revolution had been her shame in the eighteenth.

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 147.

This was Balzac's last serious attempt to stand for Parliament during the Monarchy of July, though he often talked in his letters to Madame Hanska of his political aspirations, looked forward to becoming a deputy in 1839, and hoped till then to dominate European opinion—rather a large ambition—by a political publication. In his letters he is continually on the point of beginning his career as a statesman; and in 1835 his views are even more inflated than usual. He will absorb the Revue des Deux Mondes and the Revue de Paris, is in treaty to obtain one newspaper, and will start two others himself, so that his power will be irresistible. "Le temps presse, les évènements se compliquent," * he cries impatiently. He is still strangled by want of money—a hundred thousand francs is the modest sum he requires; but he will write a play in the name of his secretary, and the spectre of debt will be laid for ever.

However, in the stress of work, which made his own life like the crowded canvas of one of his own novels, these brilliant schemes came to nothing, and Balzac was never in the proud position of a deputy. He gives his views clearly in a letter to Madame Carraud in 1830.† "France ought to be a constitutional monarchy, to have a hereditary royal family, a house of peers of extraordinary strength, which will represent property, etc., with all possible guarantees for heredity, and privileges of which the nature must be discussed; then a second assembly, elective, representing all the interests of the intermediary mass, which separates those of high social position from the classes who are generally termed the people.

"The purport of the laws, and their spirit, should be designed to enlighten the masses as much as possible—those who have nothing, the workmen, the common people, etc., in order that as many as possible should arrive at the intermediary state; but the people should, at the same time, be kept under a most powerful yoke, so that its individuals may find light, help, and protection, and that no idea, no statute, no transaction, may make them turbulent.

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

† "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 108.

"The greatest possible liberty should be allowed to the leisured classes, for they possess something to keep, they have everything to lose, they can never be dissolute.

"As much power as possible should be granted to the Government. Thus the Government, the rich people, and the bourgeoisie have interest in keeping the lowest class happy, and in increasing the number of the middle class, which is the true strength of the state.

"If rich people, the hereditary possessors of fortune in the highest Chamber, are corrupt in their manners, and start abuses, these are inseparable from the existence of all society; they must be accepted, to balance the advantages given."

This extract is taken from a letter which is, Balzac tells his correspondent, strictly private; but, with his usual independence and fearlessness, he did not hesitate to enunciate his opinions in public, and invariably refused to stoop to compromise or to disguise. Consequently, we cannot wonder that he never attained his ambition; particularly as he lacked the aid of money, and had no support, except the politically doubtful one of a literary reputation. His penetration and power of prescience were remarkable, and it is startling to find that he foretells the fall of the Monarchy of July, and the Revolution of 1848.* "I do not think," he says, "that in ten years from now the actual form of government will subsist—August, 1830, has forgotten the part played by youth and intelligence. Youth compressed will burst like the boiler of a steam engine." In "Les Paysans," one of his most wonderful novels, he gives a vivid picture of the constant struggle going on under the surface between the peasants and the bourgeoisie, and shows that the triumph of the former class must be the inevitable result.

His was essentially a loyal, reverential nature, with the soldierly respect for constituted authority which is often the characteristic of strong natures; and he was absolutely unswerving in his principles—the courage and tenacity which distinguished him through life, never deserting him in political emergencies. He was patriotic and high-minded; absolutely immovable in all that concerned his duty. On one occasion, when it was proposed at a public meeting that the Legitimists should follow the example of their political opponents and should stoop to evil doings, he refused decidedly, saying: "The cause of the life of man is superhuman. It is God who judges; His judgment does not hinge on our passions." † In his eyes, Religion and the Monarchy were twin sisters, and he speaks sadly in "Le Médecin de Campagne" of the downfall of both these powers. "With the monarchy we have lost honour, with our unfruitful attempts at government, patriotism; and with our fathers' religion, Christian virtue. These principles now only exist partially, instead of inspiring the masses, for these ideas never perish altogether. At present, to support society we have nothing but selfishness." * Elsewhere, he laments the atheistic government, and the increase of incredulity; and longs for Christian institutions, and a strong hierarchy, united to a religious society.

* "Revue Parisienne," p. 26.

† "Balzac et ses Œuvres," by Lamartine de Prat.

Balzac was not orthodox. There is no doubt, from a letter to Madame Hanska, that the Swedenborgian creed he enunciates in "Séraphita" is to a great extent his own; but he believed in God, in the immortality of the soul, and considered natural religion, of which, in his eyes, the Bourbons were the depositors, absolutely essential to the well-being of a State. He had a great respect for the priesthood, and has left many a charming and sympathetic picture of the parish curé, such as l'Abbé Janvier in "Le Médecin de Campagne," who acts hand in hand with the good doctor Benassis, as an enlightened benefactor to the poor; or l'Abbé Bonnet, the hero of "Le Curé du Village," whose face had "the impress of faith, an impress giving the stamp of the human greatness which approaches most nearly to divine greatness, and of which the undefinable expression beautifies the most ordinary features." In "Les Paysans" we have another fine portrait, L'Abbé Brossette, who is doing his work nobly among debased and cunning peasants. "To serve was his motto, to serve the Church and the Monarchy at the most menaced points; to serve in the last rank, like a soldier who feels destined sooner or later to rise to generalship, by his desire to do well, and by his courage."

* "Le Médecin de Campagne."

There is a beautiful touch in that terrible book "La Cousine Bette," where the infamous Madame Marneffe is dying of a loathsome and infectious disease, so that even Bette, who feels for her the "strongest sentiment known, the affection of a woman for a woman, had not the heroic constancy of the Church," and could not enter the room. Religion alone, in the guise of a Sister of Mercy, watched over her.

CHAPTER X

1836

Balzac starts the Chronique de Paris—Balzac and Théophile Gautier—Lawsuit with the Revue de Paris—Failure of the Chronique—Strain and exhaustion—Balzac travels in Italy—Madame Marbouty—Return to Paris—Death of Madame de Berny—Balzac's grief and family anxieties—He is imprisoned for refusal to serve in Garde Nationale—Werdet's failure—Balzac's desperate pecuniary position and prodigies of work—Close of the disastrous year 1836.

BALZAC opened the first day of the year 1836 by becoming proprietor of the Chronique de Paris, an obscure Legitimist publication, which had been founded in 1834 by M. William Duckett. It started under Balzac's management with a great flourish of trumpets, the Comte (afterwards Marquis) de Belloy and the Comte de Gramont taking posts as his secretaries ; while Jules Sandeau, Émile Regnault, Gustave Planche, Théophile Gautier, Charles de Bernard, and others, became his collaborators. Balzac's special work was to provide a series of papers on political questions, entitled " La France et l'Étranger," papers which show his extraordinary versatility ; and his helpers were to provide novels and poems, satire, drama, and social criticism ; so that the scope of the periodical was a wide one.

At first, Balzac was most sanguine about the success of his new enterprise, and was very active and enthusiastic in working for it. On March 27th, he wrote to Madame Hanska about the embarrassment caused him by his plate having been pawned during his unfortunate absence in Vienna, nearly a year ago. It was worth five or six thousand francs, and he required three thousand to redeem it. This sum he had never been able to raise, while, to add to his difficulties, on the 31st of the month he would owe about eight thousand four hundred francs. Nevertheless, he must have the silver next day or perish, as he had asked some people to dine who would, he hoped, give sixteen thousand francs for sixteen shares in the Chronique. If borrowed plate were on his table he was terribly afraid that the whole transaction would fail; as one of the people invited was a painter, and painters are an "observant, malicious, profound race, who take in everything at a glance."* Everything else in his rooms would represent the opulence, ease, and wealth of the happy artist.

Poor Balzac! To add to his difficulties, it was impossible to borrow anywhere in Paris, as he had only purchased the Chronique through the exceptional credit he enjoyed, and this would be at once destroyed if he were known to be in difficulties. We do not hear any further particulars about this tragedy, and cannot tell how far the conjunction of the borrowed plate—if it were after all borrowed—and the astute painter, contributed to the downfall of the Chronique. Werdet, however, attributes the disaster to the laziness of the talented staff, who could not be induced to work together. However that may be, the result was a terrible blow to Balzac; who was now, in addition to all his other liabilities, in debt for forty thousand francs to the shareholders.

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

It is as a member of the staff of the Chronique, that the name of Théophile Gautier first appears in connection with Balzac; and the two men remained close friends till Balzac's death. In 1835 Théophile Gautier published "Mademoiselle de Maupin," in which his incomparable style excited Balzac's intense admiration, painfully conscious as he was of his own deficiencies in this direction. Therefore, in forming the staff of the Chronique, he at once thought of Gautier, and despatched Jules Sandeau to arrange matters with the young author, and to give him an invitation to breakfast. Théophile Gautier, much flattered, but at the same time rather alarmed at the idea of an interview with the celebrated Balzac, tells us that he thought over various brilliant discourses on his way to the Rue Cassini, but was so nervous when he arrived that all his preparations came to nothing, and he merely remarked on the fineness of the weather. However, Balzac soon put him at his ease, and evidently took a fancy to him at once, as during breakfast he let him into the secret that for this solemn occasion he had borrowed silver dishes from his publisher!

The friendship between Balzac and Gautier, though not as intimate and confidential as that between Balzac and Borget, was true and steadfast; and was never disturbed by literary jealousy. Gautier supported Balzac's plays in La Presse, and helped with many of his writings. Traces of his workmanship, M. de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul tells us, are specially noticeable in the descriptions of the art of painting and of the studio, in the edition of "Un Chef-d'Œuvre Inconnu" which appeared in 1837.* These descriptions are in Gautier's manner, and do not appear in the edition of 1831; so that in all probability they were written, or at any rate inspired by him. Gautier also wrote for Balzac, who had absolutely no faculty for verse, the supposed translation of two Spanish sonnets in the "Mémoires de Deux Jeunes Mariées," and the sonnet called "La Tulipe" in "Un Grand Homme de Province à Paris." On his side, Balzac defended Gautier on all occasions, and in 1839 dedicated "Les Secrets de la Princesse de Cadignan," then called "Une Princesse Parisienne," "À Théophile Gautier, son ami, H. de Balzac."

Beyond this friendship, the affair of the Chronique brought Balzac nothing but worry and trouble. And it came at a time when misfortune assailed him on all sides. Madame de Berny was approaching her end, and he wrote to his mother on January 1st, 1836, the day he started the Chronique de Paris: "Ah! my poor mother, I am broken-hearted. Madame de Berny is dying! It is impossible to doubt it! Only God and I know what is my despair. And I must work! work weeping." *

* "H. de Balzac and Théophile Gautier" in "Autour de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

In the midst of his trouble, a most unfortunate occurrence took place, which besides embittering his life at the time had a decided effect on his subsequent career; and indirectly obscured his reputation even after his death.

In 1833, as we have already seen, Balzac, after long dissensions with Amédée Pichot, had definitely left the Revue de Paris. However, in 1834, when Pichot retired from the management, the new directors, MM. Anthoine de Saint-Joseph, Bonnaire, and Achille Brindeau, tried to satisfy their readers by recalling Balzac; and "Séraphita" began to appear in the pages of the Revue. Difficulties, as might be expected, soon arose between Balzac and the management; and the undercurrent of irritation which subsisted on both sides only required some slight extra cause of offence, to render an outbreak inevitable. In September, 1835, M. Buloz, already director of the Revue des Deux Mondes, an extremely able, but bad-mannered and dictatorial man, took possession also of the much-tossed-about Revue de Paris. Balzac had known Buloz since 1831, when the latter had bought the Revue des Deux Mondes, which was then in very low water, and was working with tremendous energy to make it successful. At that time, Buloz and he often shared a modest dinner, and with the permission of M. Rabou, then manager of the Revue de Paris, Balzac contributed "L'Enfant Maudit," "Le Message," and "Le Rendez-Vous" to the Revue des Deux Mondes, and only charged a hundred francs for the same quantity of pages for which he was paid a hundred and sixty francs by Rabou. However, on April 15th, 1832, there appeared in the Revue des Deux Mondes a scathing, anonymous criticism of the first dizain of the "Contes Drôlatiques." This had apparently been written by Gustave Planche; but Balzac considered Buloz responsible for it, and therefore refused to write any longer for his review. In August, 1832, Buloz, who does not appear to have been particularly scrupulous in his business relations, wrote to apologise, saying that though it was not in his power to suppress the offending article, he had done his best to soften it; and that now he was sole master of the Review, so that not a word or a line could pass without his permission. He therefore begged Balzac to resume his old connection with him, and explained that if he had not been confined to his bed and unable to walk, or even to bear the shaking of a cab, he would have come to visit him, and matters would have been quickly arranged. Balzac's answer, which is written from Angoulême, is couched in the uncompromising terms of "no surrender," which he generally adopted when he considered himself aggrieved. He did not absolutely refuse to write for the Review, and referred Buloz to Madame de Balzac for terms; but, by the tone of his letter, he negatived decidedly the idea of resuming friendly relations with his correspondent, and while rather illogically professing a lofty indifference to criticism, remarked that he felt the utmost contempt for those who calumniated his books.*

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 323.

After this the Revue des Deux Mondes became hostile to Balzac; and when Buloz and Brindeau bought the Revue de Paris, a proceeding which must have been a shock to him, he believed that Brindeau would be sole director, and drew up his agreement with him alone; having already refused to have business dealings with the ever active Buloz. However, Buloz soon took the principal place, and was so apologetic for his past misdeeds, and so insistent in promising amendment for the future, that Balzac, evidently reflecting that it would be distinctly against his interests to exclude himself from two of the most important reviews in Paris, consented to reconsider his decision. Therefore the following agreement, which is interesting as an example of Balzac's usual conditions when issuing his novels in serial form, was drawn up between the two men.

The Review was only to use Balzac's articles for its subscribers. He was to regain absolute rights over his books three months after their first publication—this was an invariable stipulation in all Balzac's treaties—and was to give up fifty francs out of the two hundred and fifty considered due to him for each "feuille" of fifteen pages, to reimburse Buloz for the number of times the proofs had to be reprinted.* On these terms he agreed to finish "Le Père Goriot," as well as "Séraphita," and to write the "Mémoires d'une Jeune Mariée," with the understanding that a separate contract was to be made for each of his contributions, and that he was free to write for other periodicals.

* See "Correspondance Inédite—Honoré de Balzac," Revue Bleue, March 14th, 1903.

Almost at once difficulties began, difficulties which are inevitable when a genius of the stamp of Balzac is bound by an unfortunate agreement to provide a specified quantity of copy at stated intervals. Balzac could not write to order. "Séraphita," planned to please Madame Hanska, was intended to be a masterpiece such as the world had never seen. From Balzac's letters there is no doubt that he was conscientiously anxious to finish it, only, as he remarks, "I have perhaps presumed too much on my strength in thinking that I could do so many things in so short a time." * When he made the unfortunate journey to Vienna, "Séraphita" still required, at his own computation, eight days' and eight nights' work; but, settled there, he turned his attention at once to "Le Lys dans la Vallée," which he had substituted for the "Mémoires d'une Jeune Mariée," and at which he laboured strenuously. The first number of this appeared in the Revue de Paris, on November 22nd, 1835; but in the meantime Balzac's uncorrected proofs had been sold by Buloz to MM. Bellizard and Dufour, proprietors of the Revue Étrangère de St. Petersbourg. Therefore, in October, before the authorised version was published in Paris, there appeared in Russia, under the title of "Le Lys dans la Vallée," what Balzac indignantly characterised as the "unformed thoughts which served me as sketch and plan."

* The account of the lawsuit between Balzac and the Revue de Paris is taken from his "Historique du Procès auquel a donné lieu 'Le Lys dans la Vallée,'" which formed the second preface of the first edition of "Le Lys dans la Vallée" and is contained in vol. xxii. of the Édition Définitive of Balzac's works; and from "H. de Balzac et 'La Revue de Paris,'" which is the Review's account of the case, and may be found in "Un dernier chapitre de l'Histoire des Œuvres de H. de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

This was double treachery on the part of Buloz, as, by the treaty already mentioned, he had bought the right to publish Balzac's novels in the Revue de Paris only; and even if this stipulation had not been made, he had no excuse for selling as Balzac's completed work, what he knew to be absolutely unfinished. Balzac, after this, refused to receive him on friendly terms; but a meeting was arranged at the house of Jules Sandeau, at which Balzac and the Comte de Belloy met Buloz and Bonnaire. Sandeau and Émile Regnault, who were friends of both the contending parties, were also present; and they, after this conference, became for a time exclusively Balzac's friends, as he remarks significantly. Balzac owed the Review 2,100 francs ; but the remainder of the "Lys" was ready to appear, and he calculated that for this, the payment due to him would be about 2,400 francs. He therefore proposed that the account between him and the journal should be closed with the end of the "Lys"; and that as indemnity for the injury done him by the action of Buloz in publishing his unfinished work in the Revue Étrangère, he should be permitted to send the novel in book form to a publisher at once, instead of waiting the three months stipulated in the agreement. MM. Buloz and Bonnaire refused this arrangement, declaring that it would be extortion ; and after giving them twenty-four hours for reflection, Balzac announced his intention of writing no longer for the Revue de Paris, and prepared to bring an action against the proprietors.

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

Buloz and Bonnaire, however, decided that it would be good policy for the first attack to be on their side, and as Balzac could not obtain his proofs from Russia for a month at least, they sued him for breach of contract in not writing "Les Mémoires d'une Jeune Mariée," and claimed 10,000 francs damages for his refusal to finish the "Lys dans la Vallée"; as well as fifty francs for each day's delay in his doing this. Balzac brought forward his counter claim, and offered the Revue de Paris the 2,100 francs which had been advanced to him ; but they refused to be satisfied with the payment of this debt; and in May, 1836, the case opened.

There was a side issue on the subject of "Séraphita," about which the Revue certainly had just cause for complaint. In May, 1834, Balzac had been paid 1,700 francs in advance for this, and the first number appeared on June 1st, the second not following till July 20th. Then Balzac disappeared altogether; and when he returned in November, he proposed to begin "Le Père Goriot" in the Revue, and promised after this had come to an end to return to "Séraphita"; but it was not till the middle of August, 1835, that he at last produced another number. After this there were again delays, and, according to Buloz, the whole of "Séraphita" was never offered to the Revue de Paris. The truth, however, appears to have been that Buloz at last completely lost his temper at Balzac's continual failures to fulfil his engagements, and declared that "Séraphita" was unintelligible, and was losing subscribers to the Review. Balzac, furious at this insult, paid Buloz 300 francs, to defray the expenses already incurred for the printing of "Séraphita," and took back his work. Buloz's receipt for this money is dated November 21st, 1835, two days before the appearance of the first number of the "Lys dans la Vallée" in Paris, so storms were gathering on all sides. Ten days after this, on December 2nd, Werdet brought out "Séraphita" in book form in "Le Livre Mystique," which contained also "Louis Lambert" and "Les Proscrits," a fact which proved Balzac's contention that in November it was ready for publication in the Revue de Paris. The first edition of "Le Livre Mystique" was sold in ten days, and the second followed it a month after, which, as Balzac remarked sardonically, was "good fortune for an unintelligible work." This success on the part of his enemy no doubt did not help to soften the indignant Buloz; and he must have been further exasperated by an article in the Chronique de Paris, in which Balzac was styled the "Providence des Revues," and the injury the Revue de Paris sustained in the loss of his collaboration was insisted on with irritating emphasis.

The case was carried on with the utmost bitterness by the Revue de Paris; Balzac's morals, his honesty, even his prose, being attacked with the greatest violence. Editors and publishers on all sides gave their testimony against him. He must have been amazed and confounded by the deep hatred he had evoked by his want of consideration, which on several occasions certainly amounted to a breach of good faith. All his old sins found him out. Amédée Pichot, former manager of the Revue de Paris, Forfellier of the Écho de la Jeune France, and Capo de Feuillide of L'Europe Littéraire, raised their voices against the high-handed and rapacious author. The smothered enmity and irritation of years at last found vent; and it was in vain that Balzac demonstrated, in the masterly defence of his conduct written in one night, which formed the preface to the "Lys dans la Vallée," that he had always remained technically within his rights, and that as far as money was concerned he owed the publishers nothing. Unwritten conventions had been defied, because it was possible to defy them with impunity; and editors who had gone through many black hours because of the failure of the great man to keep his promises, and who smarted under the recollection of the discourteous refusal of advances it had been an effort to make, did not spare their arrogant enemy now that it was possible to band together against him.

Perhaps, however, the bitterest blow to poor Balzac, was the fact that his brother authors, of whose rights he had been consistently the champion, did not scruple to turn against him. Either terrorised by the all-powerful Buloz, or jealous of one who insisted on his own abilities and literary supremacy with loud-voiced reiteration, Alexandre Dumas, Roger de Beauvoir, Frédéric Soulié, Eugène Sue, Méry, and Balzac's future acquaintance Léon Gozlan, signed a declaration at the instance of Buloz, to the effect that it was the general custom that articles written for the Revue de Paris should be published also in the Revue Étrangère, and should thus avoid Belgian piracy. Jules Janin, whose criticisms on Balzac are peculiarly venomous, and Loève-Veimars, added riders to this statement, expressing the same views, only with greater insistence. To these assertions, Balzac replied that Buloz had specially paid George Sand 100 francs a sheet over the price arranged, to obtain the right of sending her corrected proofs to Russia; and that arrangements on a similar basis had been made with Gustave Planche and M. Fontaney. The fact that exceptional payments were made on these occasions was conclusive evidence against simultaneous publication in Paris and St. Petersburg being the received practice. Moreover, as Balzac observes with unanswerable justice, even if this custom did exist, it would count as nothing against the agreement between him and Buloz. "M. Janin can take a carriage and go himself to carry his manuscripts to Brussels; M. Sue can get into a boat and sell his books in Greece; M. Loève-Veimars can oblige his editors if they consent, to make as many pirated copies of his future works as there are languages in Europe: all that will be quite right, the Revue is to-day like a publisher. My treaties, however, are made and written; they are before the eyes of the judge, they are not denied, and state that I only gave my articles to the Revue de Paris, to be inserted solely in the Revue, and nowhere else."

Balzac won the case. It was decided by the Tribunal of Judges on Friday, June 3rd, 1836, that he was not bound to give the "Mémoires d'une Jeune Mariée" to the Revue de Paris, as when promised, the story had not been yet written, and the "Lys dans la Vallée" had been substituted for it; also that the 2100 francs which he had already offered to Buloz was all that he owed the Review. The judges left unsettled the question as to whether the proprietors of the Revue de Paris were entitled to hand over their contributors' corrected proofs to the Revue Étrangère; but decreed that they were certainly in the wrong when they parted with unfinished proofs. They were therefore condemned to pay the costs of the action.

Balzac's was a costly victory. Except the Quotidienne, which stood by him consistently, not a paper was on his side. His clumsiness of style, his habit of occasionally coining words to express his meaning, and the coarseness of some of his writings, combined with the prejudice caused by his literary arrogance, had always, to a certain extent, blinded literary and critical France to his consummate merits as a writer. Now, however, want of appreciation had changed to bitter dislike; and in addition to abuse, indiscriminate and often absurd of his writings, his enemies assailed his morals, ridiculed his personal appearance, and made fun of his dress and surroundings. He was not conciliatory; he did not bow to the storm. In June, 1839, appeared the second part of "Illusions Perdues," which was entitled "Un Grand Homme de Province à Paris," and was a violent attack on French journalism; and in March, 1843, Balzac published the "Monographie de la Presse Parisienne," a brilliant piece of work, but certainly not calculated to repair the breach between him and the publishing world. Nevertheless, though his pride and independence prevented him from trying to temporise, there is no doubt that Balzac suffered keenly from the hostility he encountered on all sides. He writes to Madame Hanska directly after the lawsuit: "Ah! you cannot imagine how intense my life has been during this month! I was alone for everything; harassed by the journal people who demanded money of me, harassed by payments to make, without having any money because I was making none, harassed by the lawsuit, harassed by my book, the proofs of which I had to correct day and night. No, I am astonished at having survived this struggle. Life is too heavy; I do not live with pleasure."* To add to his difficulties, Madame Béchet had lately become Madame Jacquillard, and possibly urged to action by M. Jacquillard, and alarmed by tales of Balzac's misdemeanours, she became restive, and demanded the last two volumes of the "Études de Mœurs" in twenty-four hours, or fifty francs for each day's delay. The affairs of the Chronique were at this time causing Balzac much anxiety, and he fled to the Margonnes at Saché; not for rest, but to work fifteen hours a day for "cette odieuse Béchet"; and there, in eight days, he not only invented and composed the "Illusions Perdues," but also wrote a third of it.

However, the strain had been too great even for his extraordinary powers, and while walking in the park after dinner with M. and Mme. de Margonne, on the day that letters arrived from Paris with the news that liquidation of the Chronique was necessary, he fell down in a fit under one of the trees. Completely stunned for the time, he could write nothing; and thought, in despair, of giving up the hopeless struggle, and of hiding himself at Wierzchownia. Fortunately, his unconquerable courage soon returned; he travelled to Paris, wound up the affairs of the Chronique; and as Werdet had allowed him twenty days' liberty, and his tailor and a workman had lent him money to pay his most pressing debts, he obtained a letter of credit from Rothschild, and started for Italy.

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

His ostensible object was a visit to Turin, to defend the Comte Guidoboni-Visconti in a lawsuit, as the Count, whose acquaintance he had made at the Italian Opera, could not go himself to Italy. In reality, however, in his exhaustion, and the overstrained state of his nerves, he craved for the freedom and distraction which he could only find in travel. Madame Visconti was an Englishwoman—another Étrangère—her name before her marriage had been Frances Sarah Lowell. Later on, she became one of Balzac's closest friends, and Madame Hanska was extremely jealous of her influence.

It is amusing to discover that Balzac did not take this journey alone. He was accompanied by a lady whom he describes in a letter as "charming, spirituelle, and virtuous," and who, never having had the chance in her life of breathing the air of Italy, and being able to steal twenty days from the fatigues of housekeeping, had trusted in him for inviolable secrecy and "scipionesque" behaviour. "She knows whom I love, and finds there the strongest safeguard." * This lady was Madame Marbouty, known in literature as Claire Brunne, and during her stay in Italy as "Marcel"—a name taken from the devoted servant in Meyerbeer's opera "Les Huguenots," which had just appeared. A few weeks earlier, she had refused to travel in Touraine with Balzac, as she considered that a journey with him in France would compromise her; but, apparently, in Italy this objection did not apply. She travelled in man's clothes, as Balzac's page, and both he and she were childishly delighted by the mystification they caused. Comte Sclopis, the celebrated Piedmontese statesman, who acted as their cicerone in Turin society, was much fascinated by the charming page. The liking was evidently mutual, as, after the travellers had left Italy, Balzac records that at Vevey, Lausanne, and all the places they visited, Marcel cried: "And no Sclopis!" and it sounds as though the exclamation had been accompanied by a sigh. Several times during the journey the lively Amazon was mistaken for George Sand, whom she resembled in face, as well as in the fancy for donning masculine attire; and the mistake caused her intense satisfaction. At Geneva, haunted to Balzac by happy memories, the travellers stayed at the Hôtel de l'Arc, and Balzac's mind was full of his lady-love, whose spirit seemed to him to hallow the place. He saw the house where she stayed, went along the road where they had walked together, and was refreshed in the midst of his troubles and anxieties by the thought of her.

* See "L'École des Ménages," in "Autour de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

On August 22nd the travellers returned to Paris on excellent terms with each other, and for some years after this journey friendly relations continued. In 1842, in remembrance of their adventure, Balzac dedicated "La Grenadière" to Madame Marbouty, under the name of Caroline, and added the words, "À la poésie du voyage, le voyageur reconnaissant." Later on, however, they quarrelled, and she wrote "Une Fausse Position," in which Balzac is represented in a decidedly unflattering light; and after this he naturally withdrew the dedication in "La Grenadière."

On his return from this amusing trip a terrible trouble awaited Balzac. Among the letters heaped together upon his writing-table was one from Alexandre de Berny, announcing abruptly the death of Madame de Berny, which had taken place on July 27th. Balzac was utterly crushed by this blow. He had not seen Madame de Berny for some time, as since the death of her favourite son she had shut herself up completely, pretending to Balzac that she was not very ill, but saying laughingly that she only wanted to see him when she was beautiful and in good health. Now she was dead, and the news came without preparation in the midst of his other troubles. She was half his life, he cried in despair; and writing to Madame Hanska he said that his sorrow had almost killed him. In the midst of this overwhelming grief other worries added their quota to the weight oppressing Balzac. Henri de Balzac gave his family continual trouble, while Laurence's husband, M. de Montzaigle, refused to support his children; in fact, the only faint relief to the darkness surrounding the Balzac family at this time was M. Surville's hopefulness about the Loire Canal scheme.

In addition to all these misfortunes, Balzac had to submit to the annoyance of several days' imprisonment in the Hôtel des Haricots, for his refusal to serve in the Garde Nationale, a duty which was, he said, the nightmare of his life. The place of detention was not luxurious. There was no fire, and he was in the same hall for a time with a number of workmen, who made a terrible noise. Fortunately, he was soon moved to a private room, where he was warm and could work in peace. After this, in terrible pecuniary difficulties, and feeling acutely the loss of the woman who had been an angel to him in his former troubles, he left the Rue Cassini and fled from Paris, to avoid further detention by the civic authorities. He took refuge at Chaillot, and under the name of Madame Veuve Durand hid at No. 13, Rue des Batailles. Here he lodged for a time in a garret formerly occupied by Jules Sandeau, from the window of which there was a magnificent view of Paris, from the École Militaire to the barrier of the Trône, and from the Panthéon to L'Étoile. From time to time Balzac would pause in his work to gaze on the ocean of houses below; but he never went out, for he was pursued by his creditors.

It is curiously characteristic of his love of luxury that, destitute as he was, he had no intention of occupying this modest garret for long, but that a drawing-room on the second floor, which would cost 700 francs, was already in preparation for his use. It was to No. 13, Rue des Batailles, that Émile de Girardin, who had just started La Presse, wrote asking him to contribute to its pages; and, in consequence, Balzac produced "La Vieille Fille," which began to appear on October 23rd, and shocked the subscribers very much. Here, too, at a most inopportune moment, Madame Hanska addressed to him a depressed and mournful letter, of which he complains bitterly. She was at this time extremely jealous of Madame Visconti, from whom she suspected that Madame de Mortsauf, in the "Lys dans la Vallée," had been drawn; and Balzac says he supposes that he must give up the Italian opera, the only pleasure he has, because a charming and graceful woman occupies the same box with him. In October he paid a sad little visit to La Boulonnière, which must have brought before him keenly the loss he had sustained; and later he spent a few days at Saché, where he was ill for a day or two as a result of mental worry and overwork.

Another blow was to fall on Balzac before the disastrous year 1836 came to a close. The "Lys dans la Vallée," on which Werdet had pinned all his hopes, had sold very badly, possibly owing to the hostility of the newspapers. As a climax to all Balzac's miseries, in October Werdet failed. This was doubly serious, as Balzac had signed several bills of exchange for his publisher, and was therefore liable for a sum of 13,000 francs. Werdet wrote a book abusing Balzac as the cause of his failure; and Balzac, on his side, was certainly unsympathetic about the misfortunes of a man whose interests, after all, were bound up with his own, and whom he politely called "childish, bird-witted, and obstinate as an ass." The truth seems to have been that, as Werdet aspired to be Balzac's sole publisher, he was obliged to buy up all the copies of Balzac's books which were already in the hands of publishers, and not having capital for this, he obtained money by credit and settled to pay by bills at long date. He also brought before the public a certain number of books by writers sympathetic to his client, and as these books were usually by young and unknown authors, their printing did not cover expenses. As a consequence of these imprudent ventures he was unable to meet his bills on maturity; and Balzac, being liable for some of them, was naturally furious, as he had to be in hiding from the creditors, while Werdet, as he remarked bitterly, was walking comfortably about Paris. Werdet was young and enthusiastic, and no doubt his imagination was fired by Balzac's pictures of the glorious time in the future, when the great writer and his publisher should have both made their fortunes, and their carriages should pass each other in the Bois de Boulogne. There is no reason, however, to think that Balzac wilfully misrepresented matters, as Werdet insinuates. He was essentially good-hearted, as every one who knew him testifies; but his extraordinary optimism and power of self-deception, combined with the charm of his personality and the overmastering influence he exercised, made him a most dangerous man to be connected with in business; and Werdet, like many another, suffered from his alliance with the improvident man of genius.

Balzac also at this time suffered severely; but he had now completely recovered his energy. In his efforts to clear himself he worked thirty nights without going to bed, sending contributions to the Chronique, the Presse, the Revue Musicale, and the Dictionnaire de la Conversation, composing the "Perle Brisée," "La Vieille Fille," and "Le Secret des Ruggieri," besides finishing the last volumes of the "Études de Mœurs" and bringing out new editions of several of his books. As the result of his labours, he calculated, with his usual cheerfulness, that if he worked day and night for six months, and after that ten hours a day for two years, he would have paid off his debts and would have a little money in hand. In the end, he bound himself for fifteen years to an association formed by a speculator named Bohain: 50,000 francs being given him at once to pay off his most pressing debts, while, by the terms of the agreement, he provided a stipulated number of volumes every year, and was given 1,500 francs a month for the first year, 3,000 francs a month for the second year, 4,000 francs for the third, and so on. Besides this, he was to receive half the profits of each book after the publisher's expenses had been defrayed. As he was extremely pleased with this arrangement, which at any rate freed him from his immediate embarrassments, a faint ray of sunlight shone for him on the close of the sad year of 1836.

CHAPTER XI

1836—1840

"Louise"—Drawing-room in Rue des Batailles—The "Cheval Rouge"—Balzac's second visit to Italy—Conversation with Genoese merchant—Buys Les Jardies at Sèvres—Travels to Sardinia to obtain silver from worked-out mines—Disappointment—Balzac goes on to Italy—Takes up his abode in Les Jardies—Life there—He hopes to write a successful play—"L'École des Ménages"—Balzac's half-starved condition—He defends Peytel.

It is curious to find that during the events recorded in the last chapter, when, to put the matter mildly, Balzac's spare time was limited, he yet managed to conduct a sentimental correspondence with "Louise," a lady he never met and whose name he did not know. Apparently, in the midst of his troubles, he was seized by an overmastering desire to pour out his feelings in writing to some kindred soul. Madame Hanska was far away, and could not answer promptly; besides, though passionately loved, she was not always sympathetic, the solid quality of her mind not responding readily to the quickness and delicacy of Balzac's emotions. Louise, to whom in 1844 he dedicated "Facino Cane," was close at hand; she was evidently mournful, sentimental, and admiring; she sent him flowers when he was in prison, and at another time a sepia drawing. Besides, her shadowy figure was decked for him with the fascination of the unknown, and there was excitement in the wonder whether the veil enveloping her would ever be lifted, and, like Madame Hanska, she would emerge a divinity of flesh and blood. However, in spite of Balzac's entreaties she refused to reveal her identity; and after about a year's correspondence, during which time Louise suffered from a great misfortune, the nature of which she kept secret, the letters between them ceased altogether.

Balzac had now left his garret, and was established in the drawing-room on the second floor of 13, Rue des Batailles, which is exactly described in "La Fille aux Yeux d'Or." The room was very luxurious, and the details had been thought out with much care.* One end of it had square corners, the other end was rounded, and the corners cut off to form the semicircle were connected by a narrow dark passage, and contained—one a camp bedstead, and the other a writing-table. A secret door led to this hiding-place, and here Balzac took refuge when pursued by emissaries from the Garde Nationale, creditors, or enraged editors. The scheme of colour in the room was white and flame-colour shading to the deepest pink, relieved by arabesques of black. A huge divan, fifty feet long and as broad as a mattress, ran round the horseshoe. This, like the rest of the furniture, was covered in white cashmere decked with flame-coloured and black bows, and the back of it was higher than the numerous cushions by which it was adorned. Above it the walls were hung with pink Indian muslin over red material, the flame-colour and black arabesques being repeated. The curtains were pink, the mantelpiece clock and candlesticks white marble and gold, the carpet and portières of rich Oriental design, and the chandelier and candelabra to light the divan of silver gilt. About the room were elegant baskets containing white and red flowers, and in the place of honour on the table in the middle was M. de Hanski's magnificent gold and malachite inkstand. Balzac showed the glories of this splendid apartment with infantile pride and delight to visitors; and here, reckless of his pecuniary embarrassments, he gave a grand dinner to Théophile Gautier, the Marquis de Belloy, and Boulanger, and entertained them in the evening with good stories "à la Rabelais."

* See "Honoré de Balzac" in "Portraits Contemporains," by Théophile Gautier.

About this time Balzac started the association he called the "Cheval Rouge," which was intended to be a mutual help society among a number of friends, who were to push and praise each other's compositions, and to rise as one man against any one who dared to attack a member of the alliance. The idea was a good one; but there was a comic side to it as conducted by Balzac, and the "Cheval Rouge," after five or six meetings, ceased to exist without having seriously justified its existence.

Théophile Gautier, Jules Sandeau, and Léon Gozlan were among the members; and so dazzling were the pictures drawn by Balzac of the powers and scope of the society, that each one saw himself in imagination with a seat in the French Academy, and in succession peer of France, minister, and millionaire. It was sad that with these lofty aims the association should have been dissolved because most of its members were not able to pay their fifteen francs subscription. The first meeting was held at the Cheval Rouge, a very modest restaurant on the "Quai de l'Entrepôt," from which the society took its name. The members were summoned by a card with a little red horse on it, and under this the words "Stable such a day, such a place." Everything was carried on with the greatest secrecy and mystery, and the arrangements, which were conducted by Balzac with much seriousness, afforded him intense pleasure. The "Cheval Rouge" might have been a dangerous political society from the precautions he took. In order to avoid suspicion one member was always to greet another member coldly in society; and Balzac would pretend to meet Gautier with much ceremony for the first time in a drawing-room, and then by delighted winks and grimaces would point out to him how well he was acting.

In March, 1837, Balzac paid his second visit to Italy; travelling through a part of Switzerland, stopping at Milan, Venice, Genoa, and Florence, and returning to Paris on May 3rd. His he was, he said, detestable at this time, and he requi rest and change. He went alone, as Gautier, w had intended to be his companion, was kept Paris by the necessity of writing criticisms on pictures in the Salon. One object of Balz journey was to visit Florence to see Bartoli bust of Madame Hanska, of which he eviden approved, as he asked M. de Hanski's permis to have a small copy made of it which he co always keep on his writing-table; but this never sent to him. He was delighted w Venice, which he now saw for the first time;

in Florence was specially charmed with the pict
at the Pitti, though he found travelling by him rather dull, and decided that his next journ should be undertaken at a time when Gautier co accompany him. At Genoa he met a merchant, to whom he unfortunately confided last brilliant scheme for making his fortune wh was floating through his active brain.

He had read in Tacitus that the Romans fo silver in Sardinia; and it occurred to him that the ancients were not learned in extracting me silver might still be found among the lead wh was turned out of the mines as refuse.
Genoese merchant appeared much interested Balzac's conversation, and remarked that, owing the carelessness of the Sardinians, whole mount of dross, containing lead, and most probably sil were left in the vicinity of the mines. He most obliging: he promised to send Balzac a specimen of the dross that it might be submitted to Parisian experts, and if the result were satisfactory, Balzac and he were to ask for a permit from the Government at Turin, and would work the mines together. When this had been arranged Balzac departed in high spirits, determined to keep his secret carefully, and feeling that at last he was on the high road to fortune. On the way back he was detained in quarantine for some time, and partly from economy, partly because he wanted to see Neufchâtel, where he had first met Madame Hanska, he travelled back by Milan and the Splügen, and reached Paris in perfect health.

Here fresh misfortunes awaited him, as Werdet was bankrupt, and, as a consequence, his creditors pursued Balzac. Never in future would he be answerable or sign his name for any one, he cried in despair. He had forestalled the money allowed him by his treaty with Bohain, was working day and night, and in a few days would retire into an unknown garret, and live as he had done in the Rue Lesdiguières. Nevertheless, in his anxiety to see Madame Hanska, he had begun to think out economical ways of getting to Ukraine. He was not very well at this time, and in August he went to Saché, to see whether his native air would revive him.

His next action would be astonishing to any one unacquainted with his extraordinary recklessness. In October 1837 he gave up the rooms at the Rue Cassini, which he had kept during the time of his residence at Passy; and in order to escape what he termed "an atrocious law" on the subject of his abhorrence the Garde Nationale, he bought a piece of land in the Ville d'Avray, at Sèvres, on which he began to build a house, planned by himself. This soon acquired celebrity as "Les Jardies," and gave much amusement to the Parisians, who were never tired of inventing stories about Balzac's villa. In March, 1838, before he settled in his new abode, he started on a journey to Sardinia to investigate matters himself about the mines. It was a year since the Genoese merchant had promised to send him a specimen of the dross, and as nothing had yet arrived, he was beginning to feel anxious.

The object of his journey was kept absolutely secret; owing to the dangers of the post even Madame Hanska being told only that "it is neither a marriage, nor anything adventurous, foolish, frivolous, or imprudent. It is a serious and scientific affair, about which it is impossible for me to tell you a word, because I am bound to the most absolute secrecy."* He had to borrow from his mother and from a cousin, and to pawn his jewellery to obtain money for his expedition. On the way he stayed with the Carrauds at Frapesle, where he was ill for a few days; and he went from there to pay his "comrade" George Sand a three days' visit at Nohant. He found her in man's attire, smoking a "houka," very sad, and working enormously; and he and she had long talks, lasting from five in the evening till five in the morning, and ranging over manners, morals, love affairs, and literature. She approved of "La Première Demoiselle," a play planned in February, 1837, which Madame Hanska had discouraged because she did not like the plot; and Balzac determined to work at it seriously now that "César Birotteau" was finished. This brilliant picture of the Parisian bourgeoisie had been published in December, 1837, under the title of "Histoire de la Grandeur et de la Décadence de César Birotteau." Since then, Balzac had produced nothing new in book form, though he was writing "La Maison de Nucingen" for La Presse, and was working at "Massimilla Doni," and at the second part of "Illusions Perdues." He was also preparing to bring out a "Balzac Illustré," which was to be a complete edition of his works with pictures; but of this only one volume, "La Peau de Chagrin," was ever published.

* "Lettres à l'Etrangère."

From Nohant he went to Marseilles, and from there he sent letters both to his mother and to Madame Carraud, written in a very different frame of mind from his usual one when he embarked on a scheme for making his fortune. "Now that I am almost at my destination, I begin to have a thousand doubts; anyhow, one cannot risk less to gain more. I do not fear the journey, but what a return if I fail!"*

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 394.

He crossed from Marseilles to Ajaccio, and suffered much on the voyage, though he travelled on the mail steamer from Toulon, and spent a great deal of money by doing this. However, he was really trying to be economical, as on his way to Marseilles he had lived on ten sous' worth of milk a day, and when he reached there he put up at an hotel where his room cost fifteen sous and his dinner thirty.

The scenery of Corsica was, he said, magnificent; but he did not much appreciate Ajaccio, where he had to wait some time for a boat to take him to Sardinia, and said the civilisation was as primitive as that of Greenland. His only consolation about the delay was in the idea that he would have time to go on with "La Première Demoiselle," for which George Sand predicted a great success, while his sister told him it was superb. Therefore, as he had written the "Physiologie du Mariage" and "La Peau de Chagrin" against the advice of Madame de Berny, he determined to continue his play in spite of Madame Hanska's disapproval. His five days' voyage to Sardinia was most uncomfortable, as he travelled in a rowing-boat belonging to French coral fishers. The food consisted of execrable soup, made from the fish caught by the fishermen during the voyage; and Balzac had to sleep on the bridge, where he was devoured by insects. To add to his misfortunes, the boat was kept for five days in quarantine in view of the port, and the inhabitants refused to give the occupants any food, or to allow them in a bad storm to attach their cable to the port-rings. This they managed at last to do, in spite of the objections of the governor, who, determined to assert his authority, decreed that the cable should be taken off as soon as the sea became calm: a regulation which, as Balzac said, was absurd, because either the people would by that time have caught the cholera, or they would not catch it at all.

When Balzac at last landed, he felt as though he were in Central Africa or Polynesia, as the inhabitants wore no clothes, and were bronzed like Ethiopians. He was much horrified at their misery and savage condition. Their dwellings he describes as dens without chimneys, and their food in many parts consisted of a horrible bread made of acorns ground, and mixed with clay.

No doubt he was not disposed to take a particularly favourable view of Sardinia, as it was to him the scene of a bitter disappointment. He had been right in his calculations about the value of the refuse from the mines: the dross contained 10 per cent. of lead, and the lead 10 per cent. of silver. But a Marseilles company as well as his Genoese friend had been beforehand with him, had obtained from the Government at Turin the right to work the mines, and were already in possession. Balzac's monetary sacrifices, and the hardships he had suffered on his journey, were in vain; he must return to sleepless nights of work, and must redouble his efforts in the endeavour to pay back the money he had borrowed for his expedition. He showed his usual pluck at this juncture; there are no complaints in his letters, and with singular forbearance he does not even abuse the faithless Genoese merchant. His expedition was useful to others, if not to himself; as he travelled on to Italy, and made a long stay at Milan in order to work for the interests of the Viscontis, whose property, without his efforts, would have been sequestrated owing to political complications. It is significant that Madame Hanska, who was always suspicious about Madame Visconti, was not informed of this reason for his long sojourn at Milan, which we hear of from a letter to his sister. Balzac was terribly low-spirited at this time; his whole life seemed to have been a failure, and he was approaching the age of forty, the date at which he had always determined to give up his aspirations, to fight no more, and to join the great company of the resigned. He was tired out, and very homesick. He admired the Cathedral, the churches, the pictures; but he was weary of Italy, and longed for France with its grey skies and cold winds. Behind this longing, and possibly the origin of it, was a passionate desire in his disappointment and disgust of life to be again near his "polar star."

It was a comfort when, the affairs of the Viscontis being at last satisfactorily arranged, he was able on June 6th to start on his journey back to France. He travelled by the Mont Cénis, and was nearly blinded by clouds of fine dust, so that he was unable to write for some days.

When he reached Paris he only remained for a short time in the Rue des Batailles, as in July, 1838, in defiance of his doctor's warnings about damp walls, he took up his residence at Les Jardies, having at the same time a pied-à-terre in Paris at the house of Buisson, his tailor, 108, Rue Richelieu. Les Jardies was a quaint abode. Built on a slippery hill, it overlooked the Ville d'Avray with smoky Paris below, and in the distance there was a view of the plain of Montrouge and the road to Orleans, which led also to Balzac's beloved Tours. The principal staircase was outside, because Balzac, in designing the house, found that a staircase seriously interfered with the symmetry of the rooms. Therefore he placed it in an inconspicuous position in a special construction at the back, and owing to the extremely steep slope the visitor entered by the top floor, and made his way down instead of up. There were three stories, the lowest containing the drawing-room and dining-room, the second a bedroom and dressing-room, and the third Balzac's study. All round the house, which was painted to represent bricks, was a verandah supported by black columns, and the cage in the rear which held the staircase was painted red. About sixty feet behind this curious habitation was the real living-place of Les Jardies, where Balzac kept his servants. Part of this he let at a later date to the Viscontis, and they had charge of his rich library, and of the beautiful furniture brought from the Rue des Batailles, which might, if kept by its owner, have been seized by his creditors.

The interior of this charming abode was intended to be adorned with the utmost magnificence, but it was never finished; there were no curtains, and no furniture to speak of. Years after, descriptions such as the following were still scrawled in charcoal on the bare stucco: "Here is a veneering of Parian marble"; "Here is a mantelpiece in cipolin marble"; "Here is a ceiling painted by Eugène Delacroix." Balzac laughed himself at these imaginary decorations, and was much delighted when Léon Gozlan wrote in huge letters in his study, which was as bare as the other rooms, "Here is a priceless picture by Raphael." However, there was one thing at Les Jardies of which he was really proud; and that was his system of bell-ringing, which he considered a chef-d'œuvre. Instead of having hanging wires with "big, stupid, indiscreet bells" at the end of them, his bells were hidden ingeniously in an angle of the wall; and his pride in this brilliant invention made him forget any possible deficiencies in the decorations and appointments of the mansion.

The great feature, however, at Les Jardies, and the torment, the delight, and the despair of Balzac's life, was the piece of land round the house where the garden ought to have been. He had beautiful plans about this when first he arrived at Les magnolias, lilies, poplars, and willows transported there, and to make a little Eden of sweet scents, covered with plants and bushes. No doubt, in imagination he already saw his beautiful flowers, and wandered in this delightful and well-kept garden, which, as nothing with Balzac could possibly be ordinary, was to be "surprising." The reality, however, was sadly different from his expectations. In vain, by his orders asphalt paths were made in all directions, and landscape gardeners worked for months, trying with stones cunningly inserted to prop up the steep, slippery slope, and to form little terraces on which something might have a chance of growing. With the slightest shower, down tumbled these plateaus; and the work of building had to begin again. It was amusing, Léon Gozlan tells us, to see the amazement of the actor Frédérick Lemaître when he came to see Balzac; and found himself expected to walk up the side of a hill, with the ground at each step slipping under his feet. To support himself he stuck stones behind his heels, and Balzac meanwhile walked by his side with the calmness of a proprietor who is thoroughly used to the vagaries of his own territory, and scorns foreign assistance.

Occasionally, however, even Balzac came to the end of his equanimity. The wall, which separated his property from that of the neighbour below him, was a continual anxiety. In spite of all possible precautions it tumbled down constantly, and scattered stones and mortar over the ground on each side of it. After this had happened two or three times, and Balzac, while investigating the extent of the damage on one of these occasions, had fallen and injured his leg, so that he was in bed for forty days, a meeting of experts was held, and it was decided that the angle at which the wall had been built was not sufficiently acute. The error was rectified, and there were general rejoicings and congratulations ; but the next day it rained, and in the evening news was brought to Balzac that the whole structure had toppled over, and was reposing in ruins in his neighbour's garden. This was serious, as the neighbour promptly sent in an enormous bill for damages done to his carrots and turnips ; and it was probably on this occasion that Balzac wrote in March 1839 a despairing letter to Madame Carraud, containing the words : " To you, sister of my soul, I can confide my greatest secrets ; I am now in the midst of terrible misery. All the walls of Les Jardies have fallen down through the fault of the builder, who did not make any foundations." * No builder, however, managed to effect the feat of making this unfortunate wall stand upright ; and in the end, to allow it to come down in peace and comfort whenever it felt so disposed, Balzac bought the strip of his neighbour's land which bordered it, and after that, ceased to feel anguish at its vagaries.

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 453.

The wall was decidedly important, as Balzac's fortune was to be made by the contents of the garden at Les Jardies, and it would not have been satisfactory for strangers to be able to wander there at will. Balzac's new plan for becoming rich was to cover most of his territory with glass houses, and to plant 100,000 feet with pineapples. Owing to the warmth of the soil, he considered that these pineapples would not need much heat, and could be sold at five francs apiece, instead of the louis charged for them in Paris. They would therefore be quickly disposed of, and 500,000 francs would be made, which, deducting 100,000 francs for expenses, would mean a clear profit of 400,000 francs a year. "And this money will be made without a page of copy," said poor Balzac. He was, of course, absolutely confident about the success of this new undertaking, and Théophile Gautier, who tells the story,* says that a search was made for a shop in which to sell these pineapples of the future. This shop was to be painted black with lines of gold, and was to have on it in huge letters the announcement, "Ananas des Jardies"; but Gautier managed to persuade Balzac in order to avoid useless expense, not to hire it till the next year, when the pineapples would have had time to grow. However, perhaps Balzac was discouraged by the sight of the snow falling silently on his slope, or possibly his desire to make a fabulous sum of money by a successful play had for a time blotted out all other ambitions; at any rate, we hear no more of the pineapples of Les Jardies.

* "Portraits Contemporains — Honoré de Balzac," by Théophile Gautier.

Balzac's terribly embarrassed condition in 1837 caused him to return with new ardour to the idea which haunted him all his life, that of an immense theatrical success which should put an end for ever to his pecuniary embarrassments. References to projected plays, to the difficulty he found in writing them, and to his hope of finally freeing himself from debt by producing a masterpiece at the theatre, occur constantly in his letters. "Marie Touchet" and "Philippe le Réservé"—afterwards to become "Les Ressources de Quinola"—were the names of some of the plays he intended to write. In February, 1837, as we have already seen, he planned out "La Première Demoiselle," which he abandoned for the time, but which he worked at with much energy during his ill-fated expedition to Sardinia, and continued at Les Jardies during the summer and autumn of 1838. Before starting for Sardinia he wrote to Madame Carraud: "If I fail in what I undertake, I shall throw myself with all my might into writing for the theatre." He kept his word, and "La Première Demoiselle," a gloomy bourgeois tragedy, which soon received the name of "L'École des Ménages," was the result.

With the distrust in himself, which always in matters dramatic mingled with his optimistic self-confidence, Balzac determined to have a collaborator, and chose a young man named Lassailly, who was peculiarly unfitted for the difficult post. In doing this he only gave one instance out of many of the wide gulf which separated Balzac the writer, gifted with psychological powers which almost amounted to second sight, and Balzac in ordinary life, many of whose misfortunes had their origin in an apparent want of knowledge of human nature, which caused him to make deplorable mistakes in choosing his associates.

The agreement between Balzac and his collaborator stipulated that the latter should be lodged and fed at the expense of Balzac, and should, on his side, be always at hand to help his partner with dramatic ideas. Balzac performed his part of the treaty nobly, and Lassailly remembered long afterwards the glories of the fare at Les Jardies; but his life became a burden to him from his incapacity to do what was expected of him, and he was nearly killed by Balzac's nocturnal habits. He was permitted to go to bed when he liked; but at two or three in the morning Balzac's peremptory bell would summon him to work, and he would rise, frightened and half stupefied with sleep, to find his employer waiting for him, stern and pale from his vigil. "For," Léon Gozlan says, "the Balzac fighting with the demon of his nightly work had nothing in common with the Balzac of the street and of the drawing-room."* He would be asked severely what help he could give, and, as a result of his terrified and drowsy stammerings would be sent to bed for another hour, to see whether in that time inspiration would visit him. Six or eight times in the course of the night would this scene be repeated; and at last Lassailly, who was delicate, became seriously ill and had to leave Les Jardies, ever after looking back on the terrible Balzac and his appalling night-watches, as a nightmare to be recalled with a shudder.

Balzac, deprived of Lassailly's valuable assistance, worked on alone; and at first everything seemed likely to go well with "L'École des Ménages."† The Renaissance, a new theatre which had opened on November 8th, 1838, with the first representation of Victor Hugo's "Ruy Blas," seemed willing to take Balzac's play to follow this; and M. Armand Pérémé, a distinguished antiquary whom Balzac had met at Frapesle, was most active in conducting the negotiations. However, in the end, the Renaissance refused the drama. Balzac was terribly dilatory, and irritated every one by not keeping his engagements, and he was also high-handed about the arrangements he considered necessary to the success of his tragedy. His unfortunate monetary embarrassments, too, made it necessary for him to ask for 16,000 francs before the play was written, a request which the Renaissance Theatre was rather slow in granting. However, the real reason for the rejection of the drama, which took place on February 26th, 1839—just at the time when Balzac was in despair because the wall at Les Jardies had fallen down—was want of money on the part of the managers of the theatre. The only thing that could save the Renaissance from ruin was a great success; and Alexandre Dumas, with whom the directors had formerly quarrelled, had now made peace with them, and had offered them "L'Alchimiste," which would be certain to attract large audiences. They accepted this in place of Balzac's play, and "L'École des Ménages," of which the only copy extant is in the possession of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, has never been acted.

* "Balzac en Pantoufles," by Léon Gozlan.

† See "L'École des Ménages" in "Autour de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

Balzac was in terrible trouble about the rejection of the drama from which he had hoped so much. He wrote to Madame Carraud * in March, 1839: "I have broken down like a foundered horse. I shall certainly require rest at Frapesle. The Renaissance had promised me 6,000 francs bounty to write a piece in five acts; Pérémé was the agent, everything was arranged. As I wanted 6,000 francs at the end of February, I set to work. I spent sixteen nights and sixteen days at it, only sleeping three hours out of the twenty-four; I employed twenty workmen at the printer's office, and I managed to write, make and compose the five acts of 'L'École

* "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 454.

I am, worn out with work, sixteen days lost, 6,000 francs to pay, and nothing! This blow has crushed me, I have not yet recovered from it. My career at the theatre will have the same course as my literary career, my first work will be refused. A superhuman courage is necessary for these terrible hurricanes of misfortune."

In the midst of his troubles, he thought with bitter regret of Madame de Berny, who would have understood everything, and have known how to help and console him. He was in a miserable state, was chased like a hare by creditors, and was on the point of lacking bread, candles, and paper. Then to add to his misery would come a sensible letter from the far-distant Madame Hanska, blaming his frivolity and levity; and, in his state of semi-starvation, poor Balzac would be almost driven frantic by words of reproach from his divinity.

A little earlier than this he had found time for an enormous amount of work which would seem completely out of his province, and had written letter after letter in the Siècle, and spent 10,000 francs, in defence of Peytel, à notary of Belley, who had been condemned to death on August 26th, 1839, for the murder of his wife and servant.

Peytel appealed against his sentence, and Balzac, who had met him several times, espoused his cause with vehemence. There did not seem to be much satisfactory defence available for the prisoner, who admitted the fact that while driving in a carriage not far from Belley, he had shot both his wife and the coachman. Balzac, however, was urgent in upholding Peytel's contention that his crime had been homicide, not murder, and brought forward the plea of "no premeditation." His energetic efforts were of no avail: Peytel was executed at Bourg on November 28th, 1839, and Balzac, who had espoused his cause with quixotic enthusiasm, was genuinely sorry. He wrote to Madame Hanska in September: "I am extremely agitated by a horrible case, the case of Peytel. I have seen this poor fellow three times. He is condemned; I start in two hours for Bourg." On November 30th he continues: "You will perhaps have heard that after two months of unheard-of efforts to save him from his punishment Peytel went two days ago to the scaffold, like a Christian, said the priest; I say, like an innocent man." *

Another disappointment this year was the fact that Balzac considered it his duty, after presenting himself as candidate for the Académie and paying many of the prescribed visits, to retire in favour of Victor Hugo. As early as 1833 he had aspired to become some day "un des Quarante," and he then said half jokingly to his sister: "When I shall work at the dictionary of the Academy!"* He was never destined to receive the honour of admittance to this august body, though after his first attempt in 1839, when he himself withdrew, he again tried his fortune in 1843 and in 1849. His normal condition of monetary embarrassment was one reason for his failure, and no doubt some of the members of l'Académie française disapproved of certain of his books, and perhaps did not admire his style. At any rate, as his enemy Saint-Beuve expressed it concisely: "M. de Balzac est trop gros pour nos fauteuils," and while men who are now absolutely unknown entered the sacred precincts without difficulty, the door remained permanently closed to the greatest novelist of the age.

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

* "Balzac, sa Vie et ses Œuvres," par Mme. L. Surville (née de Balzac).

CHAPTER XII

1840—1843

"Vautrin"—La Revue Parisienne—Société des Gens-de-Lettres—Balzac leaves Les Jardies, and goes to the Rue Basse, Passy—Death of M. de Hanski—"Les Ressources de Quinola"—"La Comédie Humaine"—Balzac goes to St. Petersburg to meet Madame Hanska—Her reasons for deferring the marriage.

THE sad fate of "L'École des Ménages" did not long discourage Balzac. At the beginning of 1840 he made an engagement to provide Harel, the speculative manager of the Théâtre Porte-St-Martin, with a drama. The play was accepted before it was written; and in order to be near the theatre Balzac established himself in the fifth floor of the house of Buisson, his tailor, at the corner of the Rue Richelieu. His proceedings were, as usual, eccentric. One day Gautier, who tells the story, was summoned in a great hurry, and found his friend clad in his monk's habit, walking up and down his elegant attic, and shivering with impatience.

"'Here is Théo at last,' he cried, when he saw me. 'You idler! dawdle! sloth! gee up, do make haste! you ought to have been here an hour ago! To-morrow I am going to read to Harel a grand drama in five acts.'

and said simply, 'The drama is not written.'

"'Good heavens!' said I: 'well, then, you must put off the reading for six weeks.'

"'No, we must hurry on the drama to get the money. In a short time I have a large sum of money to pay.'

"'To-morrow is impossible; there is no time to copy it.'

"'This is the way I have arranged things. You will write one act, Ourliac another, Laurent-Jan the third, De Belloy the fourth, I the fifth, and I shall read it at twelve o'clock as arranged. One act of a drama is only four or five hundred lines; one can do five hundred lines of dialogue in a day and the night following.'

"'Relate the subject to me, explain the plot, sketch out the characters in a few words, and I will set to work,' I said, rather frightened.

"'Ah,' he cried, with superb impatience and magnificent disdain, 'if I have to relate the subject to you, we shall never have finished!'"*

After a great deal of trouble, Gautier managed to persuade Balzac to give him a slight idea of the plot, and began a scene, of which only a few words remain in the finished work. Of all Balzac's expected collaborators, Laurent-Jan, to whom "Vautrin" is dedicated, was the only person who worked seriously.

* "Portraits Contemporains—Honoré de Balzac," by Théophile Gautier.

In the two months and a half of rehearsals Balzac became almost unrecognisable from worry and overwork. His perplexities became public property, and people used to wait at the door of the theatre to see him rush out, dressed in a huge blue coat, a white waistcoat, brown trousers, and enormous shoes with the leather tongues outside, instead of inside, his trousers. Everything he wore was many sizes too big for him, and covered with mud from the Boulevards; and it was an amusement to the frivolous Parisians to see him stride along in these peculiar garments, his face bearing the impress of the trouble and overstrain he was enduring. He was at the mercy of every one. The manager hurried and harried him, because the only hope of saving the theatre from bankruptcy was the immediate production of a successful play. The actors, knowing the piece was not finished, each clamoured for a part to suit his or her peculiar idiosyncrasies, and Balzac was so overburdened, that occasionally in despair he was tempted to abandon his play altogether.

There was tremendous excitement in Paris about the approaching first representation of "Vautrin"; and foreign politics, banquets, and even the burning question of reform, paled in interest before the great event. All seats were sold beforehand; and as there was a rush for the tickets, Balzac and Harel chose their audience, and thought that they had managed to secure one friendly to Balzac. Unfortunately, however, the seats were sold so early that many of them were parted with at a profit by the first buyers, and in the end a large proportion of the spectators were avowedly hostile to Balzac. March 14th, 1840, was the important date, and Balzac wrote to Madame Hanska: "I have gone through many miseries, and if I have a success they will be completely over. Imagine what my anxiety will be during the evening when 'Vautrin' is being acted. In five hours' time it will be decided whether I pay or do not pay my debts." *

He was very nervous beforehand, and told Léon Gozlan that he was afraid there would be a terrible disaster.

The plot of the play is extraordinary and impossible. Vautrin, the Napoleon among convicts, who appears in several of Balzac's novels, is the hero; he has declared war against society, and the scene of the drama, with Vautrin as the principal figure, passes in the aristocratic precincts of the Faubourg St. Germain. The theatre was crowded for the performance, and the three first acts, though received coldly, went off without interruption. At the fourth act, however, the storm burst, as Frédérick Lemaître, who evidently felt qualms about the success of his part, had determined to make it comic, and appeared in the strange costume of a Mexican general, with a hat trimmed with white feathers, surmounted by a bird of paradise. Worse still, when he took off this hat he showed a wig in the form of a pyramid, a coiffure which was the special prerogative of Louis Philippe! The play was doomed. The Duke of Orleans, who was in one of the boxes, left the theatre hurriedly; and it was difficult to finish the performance, so loud were the shouts, hisses, and even threats. The next day the following official announcement appeared in the Moniteur: "The Minister of the Interior has interdicted the appearance of the drama performed yesterday at the Theatre of the Porte St. Martin under the title of 'Vautrin.'" Balzac's hated foes, the journalists, of course rejoiced in his downfall, and accentuated the situation by declaring the piece to be not only disloyal, but revoltingly immoral. On the other hand, Victor Hugo, George Sand, and Mme. de Girardin, stood firmly by him, and Frédérick Lemaître, to whom Balzac evidently bore no malice for his large share in the disaster, was, he said, "sublime."

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

Léon Gozlan went to see Balzac the day after the performance, and found him outwardly calm, but his face was flushed, his hands burning, and his lips swollen, as though he had passed through a night of fever. He did not mention the scene of the night before, but talked eagerly of a plan to start a large dairy at Les Jardies, and to provide

Paris and Versailles with rich milk. He had several other equally brilliant schemes on hand: he intended to grow vines, cultivate vegetables, sell manure; and by these varied means to assure himself of an income of eighteen thousand francs.

The Director of the Beaux-Arts was sent to offer Balzac money to make up for his loss; he says, however: "They came to offer me an indemnity, and began by proposing five thousand francs. I blushed to my hair, and answered that I did not accept charity, that I had put myself two hundred thousand francs in debt by writing twelve or fifteen masterpieces, which would count for something in the glory of France in the nineteenth century; that for three months I had done nothing but rehearse 'Vautrin,' and that during those three months I should otherwise have gained twenty-five thousand francs; that a pack of creditors were after me, but that from the moment that I could not satisfy all, it was quite indifferent to me whether I were tracked by fifty or by a hundred, as the amount of courage required for resistance was the same. The Director of the Beaux-Arts, Cavé, went out, they tell me, full of esteem and admiration. 'This,' said he, 'is the first time that I have been refused.' 'So much the worse,' I answered." *

Balzac became very ill with fever and brain neuralgia the day after the performance of "Vautrin," and Madame Surville took him to her house and nursed him. When he left his bed it was, of course, to find his affairs in a worse condition than ever, and he was, as he described himself, "a stag at bay." His friendship with Madame Visconti was a consolation to him in his troubles; he describes her to Madame Hanska, who did not quite appreciate these raptures, as "one of the most amiable of women, of infinite and exquisite goodness. Of delicate, elegant beauty, she helps me to support life." Nevertheless, no friendships made up for the want of a wife, and home, the two things for which he yearned; and he writes sadly: "I have much need now of having my wounds tended and cured, and of being able to live without cares at Les Jardies, and to pass my days quietly between work and a wife. But it seems as if the story of every man will only be a novel to me." *

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

His despondency did not abate his powers of work, as from April to December he published "Z. Marcas," "Un Prince de la Bohême," and "Pierre Grassou"; while in 1841, among other masterpieces, appeared "La Fausse Maîtresse," "Une Ténébreuse Affaire," "Un Ménage de Garçon," "Ursule Mirouët," and "Les Mémoires de deux Jeunes Mariées." He was almost at the end of his courage however, and talked seriously in the case of failure in his new enterprise—the Revue Parisienne—of going to Brazil on some mad errand which he would undertake because it was mad; and of either coming back rich or disappearing altogether.

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

A monthly magazine, of which one man was to be director, manager, editor, besides being sole contributor, was a heroic attempt at making a fortune; and this was what Balzac contemplated, and accomplished for a short time in the Revue Parisienne. His mode of working was not calculated to lessen the strain to which he subjected himself, as, never able to start anything till pressed for time, he left the work till near the end of the month, when the printers were clamouring for copy. Then there was no pause or slumber for him; his attention was concentrated on his varied and difficult subjects till the moment when he rushed with disordered garments to the printer's office. There, seated anywhere—on the corner of a table, at a compositor's frame, or before a foreman's bureau—he became completely absorbed in the colossal labour of reading and correcting his proofs. The first number of the Revue Parisienne appeared on July 25th, 1840; but it was only continued for three months, as Balzac decided that the task was too much for him. During its short life however, it furnished a magnificent and striking example of his extraordinary powers and mental attainments; as each of the numbers was the size of a small volume, and he provided novels, biography, philosophy, analysis, and criticism, and treated brilliantly each subject he attacked.

A question in which Balzac took the greatest interest was that of the rights of authors and publishers, which under Louis Philippe did not meet with much respect. Not only did the Belgians reproduce French works at a cheap rate by calmly dispensing with the duty of paying their authors; but publishers in the provinces often followed this pernicious practice, and it was difficult to prosecute them. A striking instance of this injustice was to be found in the case of "Paroles d'un Croyant," by M. de Lamennais, of which ten thousand pirated copies were sold in Toulouse, where only five hundred of the authorised edition had been sent by the publisher. No redress could be obtained because, though the fact was certain, legal proofs were apparently lacking; but in consequence of this glaring infraction of the rights of both author and publisher, on December 28th, 1838, Balzac became a member of the Société des Gens-de-Lettres. This Society, which was insignificant when he first joined it, owed everything to his reputation, and to the energy with which he worked for its interests. On October 22nd, 1839, he spoke at Rouen in its behalf, in the first action brought by it against literary piracy. Later in the same year he was elected President, and in May, 1840, he drew up the masterly "Code Littéraire de la Société des Gens-de-Lettres"* to which reference has already been made. On September 5th, 1841, however, in consequence of a dispute concerning the drawing up by the Gens-de-Lettres of a manifesto to be presented to the deputies composing the Law Commission on Literary Property, Balzac withdrew from the Society. The ostensible reason for his resignation was, that at a committee meeting to discuss the Manifesto, doubts were thrown on his impartiality; but it seems probable from his letter* that some unwritten ground for complaint really caused his withdrawal. After Balzac's death, the Société des Gens-de-Lettres acknowledged with gratitude the debt owed him as one of the founders of the Society, and the help received from his intelligence and activity.

* This may be found in the Édition Définitive of Balzac's works, or in "Balzac Chez Lui," by Léon Gozlan.

In 1840, before he ceased to belong to the Société des Gens-de-Lettres, he had left Les Jardies; and had hidden himself under the name of Madame de Brugnolle, his housekeeper, in a mysterious little house at No. 19, Rue Basse, Passy; to which no one was admitted without many precautions, even after he had given the password. Behind this was a tiny garden where Balzac would sit in fine weather, and talk over the fence to M. Grandmain, his landlord. In his new abode he established many of his treasures: his bust by David d'Angers, some of the beautiful furniture he was collecting in preparation for the home he longed for, and many of his pictures, those treasures by Giorgione, Greuze, and Palma, which were the delight of his heart. With great difficulty, by publishing books and articles in quick succession, he had prevented the sale of Les Jardies by his creditors. As he had no money to pay cab fares this entailed rushing from Passy to Paris on foot, often in pouring rain; with the result that he became seriously ill, and found it necessary to recruit in Touraine and Brittany.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 20.

On June 15th, 1841, a fictitious sale for 15,500 francs was made of Les Jardies, which had cost Balzac 100,000 francs; but he did not really part with the villa till later, when he had decided that it would not be suitable ultimately as a residence. To add to his troubles, he found it necessary to take his mother to live with him, an arrangement which gave rise to many little storms, and made writing a difficult matter. Madame Visconti's society gave him no consolation at this time,—he was disappointed in her; and decided that his abuse of Englishwomen in the "Lys dans la Vallée" was perfectly justified.

Fortunately, he was now feeling tolerably cheerful about money matters; as he had paid off the hundred thousand francs he owed from his treaty in 1836, and hoped in fifteen months to have made arrangements for discharging all his debts; while three publishers, Dubochet, Furme, and Hetzel & Paulin, had undertaken to publish a complete edition of his works with engravings. This was to be the first appearance of the long-dreamt-of "Comédie Humaine," the great work of Balzac's life.

However, for a time even this took a secondary place, as on January 5th, 1842, a letter with a black seal arrived from Madame Hanska; and gave the important news of the death of M. de Hanski, which had taken place on November 10th, 1841. Balzac's letter in answer to this is pathetic to any one cognisant of his subsequent history. He begins with confidence:* "As to me, my dear adored one, although this event enables me to reach what I have desired ardently for nearly ten years, I can, before you and God, say in justice, that I have never had anything in my heart but complete submission, and that in my most terrible moments I have not soiled my soul with evil wishes." Further on, he tells her that nothing in him is changed; and suddenly seized with a terrible doubt from the ambiguous tone of her letter, he cries, in allusion to a picture of Wierzchownia which always hung in his study: "Oh! I am perhaps very unjust, but this injustice comes from the passion of my heart. I should have liked two words for myself in your letter. I have hunted for them in vain—two words for the man who, since the landscape in which you live has been before his eyes, has never continued working for ten minutes without looking at it."

He longs to start at once to see her, but from the tone of her letter he gathers that he had better wait until she writes to him again, when he begs for the assurance that her existence will henceforward belong to him, and that no cloud will ever come between them. He is alarmed about her anxiety on the subject of her letters. They are quite safe, he says, kept in a box like the one in which she keeps his. "But why this uneasiness now? Why? This is what I ask myself in terrible anxiety!" He finishes with "Adieu, my dear and beautiful life whom I love so much, and to whom I can now say 'Sempre medesimo.'"

* "Lettres à l'Etrangère."

Madame Hanska, in reply to this letter, objected strongly to the breach of "les convenances" which would be committed if Balzac came to see her early in her widowhood; and it was not till July 17th, 1843, that he was at last permitted to meet her in St. Petersburg, and then he had not seen her since his visit to Vienna, eight years before.

However, he was now full of happy anticipations, and it was with the greatest enthusiasm that he looked forward to the appearance of "Les Ressources de Quinola," which had been accepted by the Odéon, and on which he founded the most extravagant hopes. The long night of trouble was nearly over, and a late happiness would dawn upon him, heralded by a brilliant success at the theatre, which would not only free him from debt, but would also enable him to offer riches to the woman he loved.

At the first hearing of this play in the green-room of the Odéon, the company had been rather disenchanted as we know, because, after reading four acts admirably, Balzac was forced to improvise the unwritten fifth, and this he did so badly that Madame Dorval, the principal actress, refused to act. However, on the same day Lireux, the director of the Odéon, came to the Restaurant Risbeck, where Balzac was dining with Léon Gozlan, and said that he would accept the play. Balzac at once insisted that for the first three representations he must have command of the whole of the theatre, but he promised that Lireux should share the receipts with him, and these he said would be enormous. He also stipulated that for his three special performances no journalists should be admitted, there being war to the knife between him and them. As the place of Balzac's abode was kept strictly secret for fear of his creditors, the time of the rehearsal each day was to be communicated to him by a messenger from the theatre, who was told to walk in the Champs Elysées, towards the Arc de l'Étoile. At the twentieth tree on the left, past the Circle, he would find a man who would appear to be looking for a bird in the branches. The messenger was to say to him, "I have it," and the man would answer, "As you have it, what are you waiting for?" On receiving this reply the emissary from the Odéon would hand over the paper, and depart without looking behind him. The only comment that Lireux, who appears to have been a practical man, made on these curious arrangements was, that if the twentieth tree had been struck by lightning during the night, he supposed that the servant must stop at the twenty-first, and Balzac assented gravely to this proposition.

The great writer worked with his usual energy at the rehearsals, continually rewriting parts of the play, and besides this occupation spending hours in the theatre bureau, as he had determined to sell all the tickets himself. For the first night of "Les Ressources de Quinola" the audience was to be brilliantly representative of the aristocracy, beauty, and talent of France. The proscenium would, Balzac hoped, be occupied by ambassadors and ministers, the pit by the Chevaliers de St. Louis, and the orchestra stalls by peers; while deputies and state functionaries were to be placed in the second gallery, financiers in the third, and rich bourgeoisie in the fourth. Beautiful women were to be accommodated with particularly prominent places; the price of the seats was to be doubled or trebled; and to avoid the continual interruptions to which "Vautrin" was subjected, tickets were only to be sold to Balzac's assured friends. Therefore many persons who offered fabulous sums of money were refused admittance, and told that every seat was taken. By these means Balzac ultimately overreached himself, as people believed that all the seats were really sold, and that it was no use to apply for tickets. When, therefore, March 19th, 1842, the night of Balzac's anticipated triumph arrived, instead of a brilliant assemblage crowding the Odéon, it was three parts empty; and the small audience, who had paid enormously for their seats, and naturally expected a brilliant throng in the theatre, were in a critical and captious mood.

The scene of the play was laid in Spain in the time of Philip II., and much of the dialogue was witty and spirited; but Balzac had mixed up serious situations and burlesque in a manner irritating to the audience, and there were many interruptions. Balzac was fortunately unaware of his want of success; he had completely disappeared, and it was not till half-past twelve, long after the finish of the performance, that he was discovered fast asleep at the back of a box. The fourth representation of "Les Ressources de Quinola" was specially tumultuous. Lireux, being now master of the theatre, invited all the journalistic world to be present, and they, furious at their exclusion during the first three nights, encouraged the general clamour. Some of the hooters were turned out, and the audience then amused themselves by ejaculating "Splendid!" "Admirable!" "Superb!" and "Sublime!" at every sentence, and by singing comic couplets, such as:

C'est M. Balzac,
Qu'a fait tout ce mic-mac!

during the intervals.

However, after two scenes had been entirely cut out, and several others suppressed, "Quinola" ran for nineteen nights. Many years afterwards, in 1863, it was acted at the Vaudeville, and was a great success. During his lifetime Balzac's plays eceived little applause—in fact, were generally greeted with obloquy; but when it was too late for praise or blame to matter, his apotheosis as a ramatist took place; and on this occasion his bust was brought on the stage, and crowned amid general enthusiasm.

The year 1842 is important in the annals of alzac's life, as on April 23rd his novels were for the first time collected together to form the "Comédie Humaine," his great title to fame. The preface to this ranks among the celebrated prefaces of the world, and it was written at the suggestion f his friend Hetzel, who objected strongly to the prefaces signed Félix Davin, which had been placed in 1835 at the beginning of the "Études de Mœurs au XIXième Siècle," and of the "Études Philosophiques." In an amusing letter Hetzel tells Balzac that a preface should be simple, natural, rather modest, and always good-humoured. "Sum up—sum up as modestly as possible. There is the true pride, when any one has done what you have. Relate what you want to say quite calmly. Imagine yourself old, disengaged from everything even from yourself. Speak like one of your own heroes, and you will make something useful, indispensable.

"Set to work, my fat father; allow a thin publisher to speak thus to Your Fatness. You know that it is with good intentions."*

We may be grateful to Hetzel for this advice, which Balzac evidently followed; as the preface is written in a quiet and modest tone unusual with him, and he follows Hetzel's counsel, and gives a concise summary of his intention in writing the "Comédie Humaine."

He explains that he has attempted in his great work to classify man, as Buffon has classified animals, and to show that his varieties of character, like the differences of form in the lower creation, come from environment. The three great divisions of the Comédie Humaine are "Études de Mœurs," "Études Philosophiques," and "Études Analytiques"; and the "Études de Mœurs" comprise many subdivisions, each of which, in Balzac's mind, is connected with some special period of life.

The "Scènes de la Vie Privée," of which the best-known novels are "Le Père Goriot" (1834), "La Messe de l'Athée" (1836), "La Grenadière" (1832), "Albert Savarus" (1842), "Étude de Femme" (1830), "Béatrix" (1838), and "Modeste Mignon" (1844), Balzac connects with childhood and youth. The "Scènes de la Vie de Province," to which belong among others "Eugénie Grandet" (1833), "Le Lys dans la Vallée" (1835), "L'Illustre Gaudissart" (1833), "Pierrette" (1839), and "Le Curé de Tours (1832), typify a period of combat; while "Scènes de la Vie Parisienne," which contain "La Duchesse de Langeais" (1834), "César Birotteau" (1837), "La Cousine Bette" (1846), "Le Cousin Pons" (1847), "Facino Cane" (1836), "La Maison de Nucingen" (1837), and several less-known novels, show the effect of Parisian life in forming or modifying character.

* "Trois Lettres," in "Autour de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

Next Balzac turns to more exceptional existences, those which guard the interests of others, and gives us "Scènes de la Vie Militaire," comprising "Une Passion dans la Désert" (1830), and "Les Chouans" (1827); and "Scènes de la Vie Politique," which contain "Un Épisode sous la Terreur" (1831), "Une Ténébreuse Affaire" (1841), "Z. Marcas" (1840), and "L'Envers de l'Histoire Contemporaine" (1847). He finishes the "Études de Mœurs" with "Scènes de la Vie de Campagne," consisting of "Le Médecin de Campagne" (1832), "Le Curé de Village" (1837 to 1841), and Les Paysans" (1844); and these are to be, Balzac says, "the evening of this long day. Here are my purest characters, my application of the principles of order, politics, morality."

There are no subdivisions to the "Études Philosophiques," among which we find "La Peau de Chagrin," written in 1830, and considered by Balzac a link between the "Études de Mœurs" and the "Études Philosophiques"; "Jésus-Christ en Flandre" (1831), "Massimilla Doni" (1839), "La Recherche de l'Absolu" (1834), "Louis Lambert" (1832), and "Séraphita" (1835).

To the division entitled "Études Analytiques" belong only two books, "La Physiologie du Mariage" (1829), and "Petites Misères de la Vie Conjugale" (1830 to 1845).

"The Comédie Humaine" was never finished, but, incomplete as it is, it remains a noble memorial of Balzac's genius, as well as an astonishing testimony to his extraordinary power of work. The last edition of it which was published in Balzac's lifetime appeared in 1846, and formed sixteen octavo volumes. It consists of eighty-eight novels and tales, and by far the greater number of these appeared in the first edition of 1842. A strong connection is kept up between the different stories by the fact that the same characters appear over and over again, and the reader finds himself in a world peopled by beings who, as in real life, at one time take the foremost place, and anon are relegated to a subordinate position; but who preserve their identity vividly throughout.

Balzac found it impossible to manage without a pied-à-terre in Paris, and for some reason he could no longer lodge with Buisson, his tailor, so in 1842 he took a lodging in the same house with his sister, Madame Surville, at 28, Rue du Faubourg Poissonnière. Life was brightening for him; he was beginning by his strenuous efforts to diminish perceptibly his load of debt, and the star of hope shone brightly on his path.

After many doubts on the part of Madame Hanska, who was most particular in observing the proprieties, he was allowed in 1843 to meet her in St. Petersburg, and arrived on July 17th, after a rough passage from Dunkerque, during which his discomforts were nothing to him, so joyous was he at the thought of soon seeing his beloved one. Madame Hanska was established at the Hôtel Koutaïzoff, in the Rue Grande Millione, and Balzac took a lodging near, and thought St. Petersburg with its deserted streets a dreary place. All minor feelings were, however, merged in the happiness of being near Madame Hanska, of hearing her voice, and of giving expression to that passionate love which had possessed him for more than ten years. In his sight she was as young and beautiful as ever, and his fascinated eyes watched her with rapture, as she leant back thoughtfully in the little arm-chair in the blue drawing-room, her head resting against a cushion trimmed with black lace. He could recall every detail afterwards of that room, could count the points of the lace, and see the bronze ornaments filled with flowers, in which he used to catch his knees in his rapid pacings up and down; and his eyes would fill with tears, and the creations of his imagination fade and become unreal, beside the haunting pictures of his memory. He loved Madame Hanska with a love which had grown steadily since their first meeting, and which now was threatening to over-master him, so that even work would become impossible. Nevertheless, though she was most charming and affectionate, and he stayed in St Petersburg until September, nothing definite wa settled.

Madame Hanska was a prudent person; he dearly-loved daughter Anna was growing up, an it was quite necessary to settle her in life befor taking any decided step. Besides, though sh hardly allowed this to herself, there is no doub that she was rather alarmed at the prospect becoming Madame Honoré de Balzac. Th marriage would be decidedly a mésalliance for Rzewuska, and her family constantly and steadi exerted their influence to prevent her fro wrecking her future. What, they asked he would be her life with a husband as eccentri extravagant, and impecunious, as they believe Balzac to be? They collected gossip about hi in Paris, and told Madame Hanska endless storie occasionally true, often false, and sometim merely exaggerated, about his oddities, his lo affairs, and his general unsuitability for allian with an aristocratic family. It was no dou pleasant to have a man of genius and of worl wide fame as a lover; but what would be h position if she took the fatal step, and bou herself to him for life? Madame Hanska listen and paused: she well understood her advantag as a great and moneyed lady; and she was unc no illusions as to the harassed and chequer existence which she would lead with Balzac. S had often lent him money, his letters kept h well informed about the state of his affairs; and the idea of becoming wife to a man who was often forced to fly from his creditors, must have been extremely distasteful to a woman used to luxury and consideration. Maternal affection, love of her country, prudence, social and worldly considerations—besides the fear of the Czar's displeasure—were all inducements to delay; and even if she had felt towards Balzac the passionate love for the lack of which posterity has reproached her, it surely would have been the duty of an affectionate mother to think of her child's welfare before her own happiness. Later on, when Anna was married, and Balzac, broken in health and tortured by his longings, was kept a slave to Madame Hanska's caprices, the hard thing may be said of her, that she was in part the cause of the death of the man she pretended to love. In 1843, however, whatever motives incited her, her action in delaying matters appears under the circumstances to have been right; and Balzac seems to have felt that he had no just cause for complaint.

He wrote to Madame Hanska, at each of the stopping-places during his tiring overland journey back to France, and describes vividly the miserable, jolting journey through Livonia, where the carriage road was marked out by boughs thrown down in the midst of a sandy plain, and all around was depressing poverty and desolation. Berlin, peopled with Germans of "brutal heaviness," he detested, and he loathed the society dinner parties, with no conversation—nothing but tittle-tattle and Court gossip; and complained of the trains, which travelled he said no quicker than a French diligence. Nevertheless, in contrast to Russia, the great voyant was struck with the air of "liberté de mœurs" which prevailed throughout Germany. He liked Dresden, and enjoyed his visit to its picture gallery, where he especially admired a Madeleine and two Virgins by Correggio, as well as two by Raphael, one of them presumably the San Sisto Madonna. The gem of the whole collection, however, in his opinion, was Holbein's Madonna; and he longed to have Madame Hanska's hand in his while he gazed at it. As he was away from her, he was very restless, and soon tired of all he saw. He longed to be back in Paris, and to find distraction in his work. "Think of my trouble, my sadness, and my sorrow, and you will be full of pity and of indulgence for the poor exile,"* he writes.

* "Lettres à l'Étrangère."

CHAPTER XIII

1843—1846

Paméla Giraud—Balzac again attempts to become member of the Académie française—Mlle. Henriette Borel's reception into a religious house—Comte Georges Mniszech—"Les Paysans" started in La Presse—Madame Hanska's unreasonableness hinders Balzac's work—He travels with her and her daughter, and they return with him to Passy—Comtesse Anna engaged to Comte Georges Mniszech—Balzac takes Madame Hanska and her daughter to Brussels—He meets Madame Hanska at Baden-Baden—Leaves Paris again, meets Wierzchownia party at Naples—Buys bric-à-brac for future home—Work neglected—Dispute with Émile de Girardin—Balzac's unhappiness and suspense—He goes to Rome—Comes back better in health and spirits—"La Cousine Bette" and "Le Cousin Pons"—Balzac goes to Wiesbaden—Marriage of Comtesse Anna and Comte Georges Mniszech—Balzac and Madame Hanska secretly engaged—Parisian gossip.

On September 26th, 1843, during Balzac's absence in St. Petersburg, another play of which he was author was produced at the Gaîté. It was called "Paméla Giraud," and the plot is contrived with an ability which proves Balzac's increased knowledge of the art of writing for the theatre. At the same time he has attempted no innovations, but has kept to the beaten track; and the play is an old-fashioned melodrama with thrilling and heart-rending situations, and virtue triumphant at the end. Owing to Balzac's attack on journalism in the "Monographie de la Presse Parisienne," which had appeared in March, and finished with the words, "Si la presse n'existait pas, il faudrait ne pas l'inventer," the whole newspaper world was peculiarly hostile to him at this time, and his play received no mercy, and was a failure. Curiously enough, Balzac seemed rather pleased at this news, which reached him at Berlin, on his journey home to France. He had made use of the services of two practised writers for the theatre to fit his melodrama to the exigencies of the stage, and possibly this fact dulled his interest in it. At any rate he was strangely philosophical about its fate.

On November 28th, 1843, soon after his return to Paris, a vacancy was left in the Academy by the death of M. Vincent Campenon; and Charles Nodier and Victor Hugo proposed Balzac as a candidate for the empty seat. Balzac, however, soon withdrew, as he found that his impecunious condition would be a reason for his rejection, and he wrote proudly to Nodier and to M. de Pongerville, another member of the Academy, that if he could not enter L'Académie because of honourable poverty, he would never present himself at her doors when prosperity was his portion. In September, 1845, another vacancy occurred; but in spite of Madame de Girardin's entreaties that Balzac should again come forward as a candidate, he refused decidedly, and wrote to Madame Hanska that in doing this he knew himself to be consulting her wishes.

The year 1844 was not an unhappy one with Balzac, though his health was bad, and he speaks of terrible neuralgia; so that he wrote "Les Paysans" with his head in opium, as he had written "César Birotteau" with his feet in mustard. Apparently Madame Hanska held out hopes that in 1845 his long probation might come to an end, as he writes: "Days of illness are days of pleasure to me, for when I do not work with absorption of all my moral and physical qualities, I never cease thinking of 1845. I arrange houses, I furnish them, I see myself there, and I am happy." * It was a joy to him to fulfil Madame Hanska's commissions, and thus to come in contact with people who had been at any time connected with her. Therefore, in spite of his busy life, he took much trouble over the arrangements for the entrance of Anna's former governess, Mlle Henriette Borel, into a religious house in Paris, and was present at her reception into the Couvent de la Visitation, Rue l'Enfer, in December, 1845. He was rather annoyed on this occasion, as he was working tremendously hard at the "Comédie Humaine," and at his "Petites Misères de la Vie Conjugale," and the good nuns, who "thought the world turned only for themselves," told him that the ceremony would take place at one o'clock and would last an hour, whereas it was not over till four, and as he had to see Lirette afterwards, he could not get away till half-past five. However, he was consoled by the idea that he was representing his dear Countess and Anna, who were in Italy at the time, and he thought the service imposing and very dramatic, He was specially thrilled when the three new nuns threw themselves on the ground, were covered with a pall, while prayers for the dead were recited over them; and after this rose up crowned with white roses, as the brides of Christ. Lirette was radiant when she had taken the veil, and wished that every one would enter a religious house.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 102.

In July, 1844, Madame Hanska and her daughter made the acquaintance of the Comte Georges Mniszech, who appeared a very suitable parti for Anna. Balzac naturally took a keen interest in all the prospective arrangements, and consulted anxiously with Madame Hanska about the young Comte's character, which must of course be proved perfect, before a treasure like the young Countess could be confided to his keeping. It is strikingly characteristic of Balzac's disinterestedness, that though he knew that the young Countess's marriage would remove the principal obstacle between him and Madame Hanska, he was most insistent in recommending caution till the young man had been for some time on probation. However, an engagement soon took place, and it seemed as though the great desire of Balzac's heart would in a short time be within his reach, and that happiness would shine upon him at last.

In 1844 he published among other books "Modeste Mignon," "Gaudissart II," a fragment of the first part of "L'Envers de L'Histoire Contemporaine," which he entitled "Madame de la Chanterie," the end of the first part of "Splendeurs et Misères des Courtisanes," the third and last part of "Béatrix," and the first part of "Les Paysans." This began to appear in La Presse on December 3rd, and the disputes about its publication led to Balzac's final rupture with Émile de Girardin.

"Les Paysans" was never finished; but was intended to be the most considerable, as it is, even in its present fragmentary condition, one of the most remarkable of Balzac's novels. For eight years he had at intervals started on the composition of this vivid picture of the deep under-current of struggle which was going on between the peasant of France and the bourgeoisie; that deadly fight for the possession of the soil which resulted, as the great voyant plainly descried it must, in the Revolution of 1848, and the victory of the peasant. Balzac also intended to depict the demoralisation of the people by their abandonment of the Catholic religion; and the novel, in emulation of Victor Hugo and of Dumas, was to fill many volumes. The first version of it, entitled "Le Grand Propriétaire," was begun about 1835, and the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul in his interesting book entitled "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," gives the text of this, the MS. of which forms part of his collection. About the year 1836 or 1838, Balzac altered the title of his proposed novel to "Qui a Terre, a Guerre," and it was not till 1839 that he named the work "Les Paysans." In 1840 Balzac offered "Les Paysans," which he said was ready to appear in fifteen days, to M. Dujarier, the manager of La Presse, and received 1,650 francs in advance for the novel. However, in 1841 he substituted "Les Deux Frères," which was the first part of "La Rabouilleuse," for "Les Paysans," and offered the latter work as if finished to Le Messager and also to the publisher Locquin, under the title of "La Chaumière et le Château."

In April, 1843, Balzac had paid back part of his debt to La Presse by publishing "Honorine" in its columns, but in September, 1844, he received 9000 francs in advance for the still unwritten "Les Paysans." It was further arranged that when this debt had been worked out, he should be given sixty centimes a line for the remainder of the novel, and that La Presse should pay for composition and corrections. It will be noticed that Émile de Girardin, the autocratic chief of La Presse, had at last wearied of the bickering which had gone on between him and Balzac ever since their first relations in 1830, and in 1840 had handed over the task of dealing with the aggravating author to his subordinate Dujarier. The treaty concerning "Les Paysans" was therefore drawn up with Dujarier, and matters no doubt would have proceeded harmoniously, had not the latter been killed in a duel in March, 1845.

The first number of "Les Paysans" appeared on December 3rd, 1844, and then, owing to a most untoward concatenation of circumstances, there was a long pause in Balzac's contributions to La Presse. Madame Hanska had unfortunately decided for some time that she would in 1845 make one of those journeys which more than anything else threw Balzac and his affairs into inextricable confusion. Before M. de Hanski's death, however, Balzac was at any rate welcomed with effusion when, in his longing to see Madame Hanska, he left his affairs in Paris to take care of themselves. In those early days she was devotedly attached to him; besides, an adorer was a fashionable appendage for an elegant married woman, and the conquest of a distinguished man of letters like Balzac was something to be proud of. Now, however, there was no husband as a protector in the eyes of the world; and marriage, a marriage about which she felt many qualms, loomed large before her startled eyes. She had no intention of giving up the delightful luxury of Balzac's love; but might she not by judicious diplomacy, she sometimes asked herself, manage to enjoy this, without taking the last irrevocable step? Her position was not enviable, the state of feeling embodied in the words "she would and she wouldn't" always betokening in the subject a wearing variability of mind posture;

but compared with the anguish of Balzac, whom she was slowly killing by her vacillations, her woes do not deserve much sympathy.

At St. Petersburg, possibly during one of their walks on the quay, or on a cosy evening when the samovar was brought up at nine o'clock, and placed on the white table with yellowish lines—she had promised Balzac that he might meet her next year at Dresden. However, when she arrived there, and found herself in a circle of her own relations, who according to Balzac poisoned her mind against him, she not only objected to his presence, but, in her sudden fear of gossip, she forbade him to write to her again during her stay in Dresden. She sent off another letter almost at once, contradicting her last command; but she would not make up her mind whether Balzac might come to her at Dresden, whether she would consent to meet him at Frankfort, or whether he should prepare a house for her and Anna in Paris. Balzac could settle to nothing. In order to work as he understood the word, it was necessary that he should exclude all outside disturbing influence, and hear only the voices of the world where Le Père Goriot, old Grandet, La Cousine Bette, and their fellows, toiled, manœuvred, and suffered. How could he do this, how could he even arrange his business affairs, when a letter might come by any post, telling him to start at once and meet his beloved one? Precious time was wasted, never to be recalled; and when Balzac, raging with impatience and irritation, dared very gently, and with words of affection, to express the feelings which devoured him, the divinity was offended, and he received a rebuke for his impatience and tone of authority.

In April, 1845, he writes: "Shall I manage to write two numbers of the 'Paysans' in twelve days? That is the problem, for I have not a single line written. Dresden and you, between you, turn my head; I do not know what will become of me. There is nothing more fatal than the state of indecision in which you have kept me for three months. If I had started on January 1st, and had returned on February 28th, I should have been more advanced in my work, and I should have had two good months, like the ones at St. Petersburg. Dear sovereign star, how do you expect me to conceive an idea or write a single phrase, with my heart and head agitated as they have been since last November? it has been enough to make a man mad! In vain I have stuffed myself with coffee: I have only succeeded in increasing the nervous trembling of my eyes, and I have written nothing; this is my situation to-day, April 10th; and I have La Presse behind me, sending to me every day, and the 'Paysans,' which is my first long work. I am between two despairs, that of not seeing you, of not having seen you, and the literary and financial trouble, the trouble of self-respect. Oh, Charles II. was quite right to say:

'But she?' in all the affairs submitted to him by his ministers.

"I can only write you this word, and it is full of sadness, for I must work and try to forget you for several days, to belong in the future more thoroughly and surely to you. It is noon; I start again at 'Les Paysans' for the tenth time, and all the muscles in my face work like those of an animal; Nature has had enough of work—she kicks over the traces. Ah! why have I debts? Why must I work whether I wish to or not? I am so unhappy, so tormented, so despondent, that I refuse to be hopeless; you must surely see that I am more than ever yours, and that I pass my life uselessly away from you, for the glory gained by inspired work is not worth a few hours passed with you! In the end I trust only in God and in you alone: in you who do not write me a word more for that; you who might at least console me with three letters a week, and who hardly write me two, and those so short!"*

However, on April 18th he received a letter from Madame Hanska containing the words, "I wish to see you," and rushed off at once to Dresden, oblivious of everything but his one desire. La Presse apparently submitted to this interruption philosophically. Its readers had not found the opening of "Les Paysans" amusing, while Le Moniteur de l'Armée had strongly and rather absurdly objected to it, as likely to lower military prestige. La Presse had therefore decided in any case to put off the appearance of "Les Paysans" till February, and to begin the year 1845 with "La Reine Margot," by Alexandre Dumas.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 142.

Meanwhile Balzac was having a delightful time. Having joined Madame Hanska at Dresden, he travelled with her and the Comtesse Anna and Comte Georges Mniszech, who had lately become engaged, to Cannstadt, Carlsruhe, and Strasburg; and to his intense delight, in July, the Countess and her daughter came with him to Passy, and took up their abode in a little house near the Rue Basse, with a carefully chosen housemaid, cook, and man. The Czar had prohibited the journey to France, so they travelled incognito as Balzac's sister and niece, the Countess Anna taking the name of Eugénie, perhaps in remembrance of Balzac's heroine Eugénie Grandet.* In the morning they went by cab or on foot into Paris, and in the evening a carriage was at their disposal, and they visited the theatre and the opera. We can easily realise the excitement and joy Balzac felt in showing them all his treasures—the bust by David D'Angers, the precious Medici furniture of ebony encrusted with mother-of-pearl, the Cellini statuettes, and the pictures by Giorgione, Palma, Watteau, and Greuze.

July passed quickly in this mode of life, Balzac acting as cicerone to the two ladies, and their identity was fortunately not discovered. In August he conducted them as far as Brussels on their way back to Dresden, and together they visited Fontainebleau, Orléans, Bourges, his much-loved Tours, Blois, Rotterdam, La Hague, and Antwerp. At Brussels they were met by M. Georges Mniszech, who took charge of the two Countesses in Balzac's place. The latter felt obliged to write afterwards to the Count to apologise for his cold good-bye, and to explain that he had been forced to assume indifference, because he feared a complete breakdown unless he sternly repressed all appearance of feeling.

* "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

However, he was not away for long from Madame Hanska, as he spent from September 20th till October 4th with her at Baden-Baden, where she had been ordered for a course of the waters. The time there was the happiest in his life, as it seemed to him that he could now plainly see a picture of the future, which he prayed for and dreamed of in the midst of his crushing work.

On October 16th, 1845, he left Paris again, met Madame Hanska, her daughter, and prospective son-in-law at Châlons, and started with them on their Italian tour. It took a day to travel by boat from Châlons to Lyons, and another day to go by boat from Lyons to Avignon; but the time flew for Madame Hanska and Balzac, who were engrossed all the way in delightful talk. They arrived at Marseilles on October 29th, and stayed for two nights at the Hôtel d'Orient, where Balzac's friend Méry had secured rooms for them. They then went by sea to Naples, and there Balzac worked so hard at sight-seeing, saw so much, and talked so volubly, that he was quite exhausted. He remained a few days only at Naples, and had a very tiring journey back, as the sea was extremely rough; and when he reached Marseilles Méry insisted on taking him into society, so that he had no opportunity of resting even there. It was altogether a very expensive journey. He could not drink the water on board the boat coming home, and therefore was obliged to quench his thirst with champagne; and as the captain and the steward showed him extraordinary politeness, they had also to be given champagne, and invited to a lunch party at the Hôtel d'Orient when the ship arrived at Marseilles. Balzac was evidently rather ashamed of this escapade, and begged Madame Hanska not to let Georges know anything of his extravagance, as he would be certain to make fun of it.

The bric-à-brac shops at Marseilles were another terrible cause of temptation, and one to which Balzac apparently succumbed without a struggle, consoling himself with the reflection that his purchases were "de vraies occasions à saisir."

When he arrived at Passy on November 17th, and retired to bed with an attack of fever as the result of all his fatigues, he might be expected to feel slightly depressed at the thought of the time he had wasted during the last few months, and of his small advance in the work of paying off his debts. As far as we can judge, however, these were not his reflections. He was dreaming of the past year, the happiest year of his life, because so much of it had been spent with Madame Hanska; and when his mind turned to more practical subjects, he thought of various projects for buying the house which was to be their future home, and of the way it should be decorated. His mind dwelt constantly on these preparations for his married life; and he continued to correspond with Méry, and to entrust him with delicate commissions which required much bargaining. At this Méry was not, according to his own account, very successful, as he remarks in an amusing letter to Balzac: "I call to witness all the marble false gods which decorate Lazardo's dark museum. I have neglected nothing to succeed with your message. I have paid indolent visits, I have taken the airs of a bored 'agathophile,' I have turned my back on the objects of your desire. All my efforts have been in vain. They obstinately continue to ask fabulous prices." *

In February, 1845,† Balzac had written cheerfully about the 30,000 francs for "Les Paysans" which he would obtain from the publisher, and the 10,000 from the journal; of the 15,000 francs which would come to him from "La Comédie

* Letters from the collection of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, published in the Revue Bleue of December 5th, 1903.

† "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 123.

Humaine," and the 30,000 from the sale of Les Jardies, besides 10,000 francs from his other works, and 20,000 from the railway du Nord ; and had calculated that his most pressing liabilities would soon be discharged. His figures and computations on the subject of money can never be relied on, and the railway du Nord was a most unfortunate speculation, and proved a constant drain on his resources. Nevertheless, there is no doubt that he was beginning to diminish perceptibly the burden of debt which pressed upon him, and that if Madame Hanska had not existed, and if on the other hand he had not himself embarked on some mad scheme or senseless piece of extravagance, he might in a few years have become a free man. These long months of expensive inaction rendered this happy solution to the troubles of his life impossible.

Meanwhile fresh misfortunes were gathering. On November 27th, 1845, Émile de Girardin, who since Dujarier's death had resumed business relations with Balzac, addressed to him a most discourteous letter. He apparently disbelieved in the terms of the agreement by which the great writer was to be paid sixty centimes a line for "Les Paysans," and demanded a certified copy of it ;* and he also announced that for "Les Petites Misères de la Vie Conjugale," which was about to appear in the Revue, he could not pay more than forty centimes, which was, he said, his maximum price to contributors. Later on, in March, 1846, Girardin despatched another message to complain of the delay in continuing "Les Paysans," and in this he remarked with bitter emphasis that as La Presse paid so highly for what was published in her pages, she had at least the right of objecting to being treated lightly. Balzac replied on March 16th, 1846, that he was the one who ought to bear malice, as Dujarier had upset his arrangements by interrupting the publication of "Les Paysans" to substitute "La Reine Margot," by Dumas, and that now his brain required rest, and that he was starting that very day for a month's holiday in Rome.

* "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul (from which the whole account of the dispute between Balzac and Émile de Girardin is taken).

If Balzac had remained in France it is doubtful whether he would have written much, as he had been in a miserably unsettled state all the winter of 1845 to 1846. His health was bad: he mentions continual colds and neuralgia, and on one occasion remarks that owing to complete exhaustion he has slept all through the day. Besides this, his suspense about Madame Hanska's ultimate decision made him absolutely wretched. He writes to her on December 17th, 1845: "Nothing amuses me, nothing distracts me, nothing animates me; it is the death of the soul, the death of the will, the weakening of the whole being; I feel that I can only take up my work again when I see my life determined, fixed, arranged." * Later on in the same letter he says:

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 200.

"I am crushed; I have waited too long, I have hoped too much; I have been too happy this year, and I do not want anything else. After so many years of misfortune and of work, to have been free as a bird, superhumanly happy, and to return to one's cell! . . . is it possible? . . . I dream: I dream by day and by night, and the thought of the heart driven back on itself prevents all action of the thought of the brain; it is terrible!"

On one occasion Madame Hanska wrote apparently reproaching him with talking indiscreetly about her; and without finishing the letter, the end of which was affectionate, and would have calmed his mind, he at once jumped out of the cab in which he was driving, and walked for hours about Paris. He was wearing thin shoes, and there were two inches of snow on the ground; but his agitation was so great at her unjust accusations, and his indignation so fierce at the wickedness of the people who had libelled him, that he hardly knew where he was going, and returned at last, still so excited by the anguish of his mind, that he was not conscious of bodily fatigue. Such crises, and the consequent exhaustion afterwards, were not conducive to work; particularly in a man whose heart was already affected, and who had overstrained his powers for years.

Possibly in the hope of obtaining distraction and relief from the anxious misery of thought, he went into society more than usual this year; and in spite of the strained relations between the director of the Théâtre des Variétés, the last Wednesday of December, and the last day of the month with the illustrious Delphine. We laughed as much as I can laugh without you, and far from you. Delphine is really the queen of conversation; that evening she was especially sublime, brilliant, charming. Gautier was there as well; I left after having a long talk with him. He said that there was no hurry for 'Richard, Cœur d'Éponge'; the theatre is well provided at present. Perhaps Gautier and I will write the piece together later on." *

Balzac's mind was still running on the theatre. Owing to failing health and to his unfortunate love affair, he now found it more difficult to concentrate his mind than formerly, and the incessant work of earlier years was no longer possible; so that the easy road to fortune offered by a successful play became doubly attractive. "Richard Cœur d'Éponge," however, never appeared; and except several fragments, which are in the hands of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, it is doubtful whether it was written, though Balzac often discussed the plot with Gautier.

What, after all, were novels, essays, or plays,

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 212.

of what interest were scenes, plots, or characters, what was fame, what was art itself, compared with Madame Hanska? How was it possible for a man to work, with the gloriously disquieting prospect before him that in so many months, weeks, days, he should meet his divinity? The phantoms of his imagination faded to insignificance, and then to utter nullity, beside the woman of flesh and blood, the one real object in a world of shadows. On March 17th, 1846, he started on his journey to Rome, and everything became a blank, except the intoxicating thought that each hour diminished the distance between him and the woman he loved. She evidently received him with enthusiasm, and showed so much affection, that though nothing definite was settled, he felt that her ultimate decision to marry him was certain; and was only deferred to a more convenient season, when her daughter Anna should have become La Comtesse Mniszech. Therefore the whole world brightened for him, and he became again full of life and vigour. He stayed for a month in the Eternal City, was presented to the Pope, admired St. Peter's extremely, and said that he would revisit Rome next winter, and that his time there would for ever remain one of the greatest and most beautiful recollections of his life. As the route by sea was crowded by travellers who had spent Holy Week in Rome, and all wanted to return at the same time, he travelled back by Switzerland; and explored fresh country and hunted for curiosities few crowns, in the towns through which he would pass on his journey. A definite engagement did not take place till some months later; but some tacit understanding must now have been allowed by Madame Hanska, as there begin to appear from this time in Balzac's letters exact descriptions of the Sèvres china, the inlaid furniture, and the bric-à-brac, which he was buying evidently with her money as well as his own, to adorn their future home together. As usual, on his return he found his affairs in utter confusion, was pursued by creditors, and was absolutely without money. As a last misfortune, his housekeeper, Madame de Brugnolle, in whose name the habitation at Passy had been rented, and who generally managed his business affairs, was busy preparing for her approaching marriage, and had naturally no time to spare for her supposed lodger's difficulties. Altogether Balzac felt that the world was a harassing place.

However, his health was admirable, "et le talent! . . . oh! je l'ai retrouvé dans sa fleur!" * He was full of hope and confidence; and although the shares of the railway du Nord continued to fall in value, he considered that with steady work at his novels, and with the help of a successful comedy, he would soon have paid off his debts, and would have a little house of his own, with room for his beautiful things; which, owing to want of space, and also to fear of his creditors, were never unpacked. It was necessary to prove that he was as young, as fresh, and as fertile as ever, and with this object in view, in June, 1846, he began the two books which were to form the series entitled "L'Histoire des Parents Pauvres." The first, "La Cousine Bette," appeared in the Constitutionnel from October to December, 1846, and is intended to represent "a poor relation oppressed by humiliations and injuries, living in the midst of three or four families of her relations, and meditating vengeance for the bruising of her amour-propre, and for her wounded vanity!" * The second received several names in turn. It was first called "Le Vieux Musicien," next "Le Bonhomme Pons," and then "Le Parasite," a title on which Balzac said he had decided definitely. However, Madame Hanska objected, as she declared that "Le Parasite" was only suitable for an eighteenth-century comedy, and the book appeared in April, 1847, as "Le Cousin Pons." Though intensely tragic, it is not as horrible or revolting as its pendant, the gloomy "Cousine Bette"; and Balzac has portrayed admirably the simple old man with

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 239.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 243.

Pons. In writing these two remarkable books, his last important works, Balzac proved conclusively that his hand had not lost its cunning, and that the slow rate of literary production during the last few years of his life was caused by his unhappy circumstances, and not by any failure in his genius.

After all, the year 1846 ended for him with agitation which increased his heart disease. His beloved trio, whom he had christened the "troupe Bilboquet," after the vaudeville "Les Saltimbanques," had now moved to Wiesbaden; and thither their faithful "Bilboquet," the "vetturino per amore," as Madame de Girardin laughingly called him, rushed to meet them. He found "notre grande et chère Atala" rather crippled with rheumatism, and not able to take the exercise which was necessary for her, but in his eyes as beautiful as ever. The "gentille Zéphirine," otherwise the Countess Anna, was gay, charming, and beautifully dressed; and "Gringalet," the Count, was completely occupied—when not making love—with his collection of insects, on which he spent large sums. About this collection Balzac made many rather heavy jokes, calling the Count

a "Gringalet sphynx-lepidoptère-coléoptère-antédiluvien," * but in an anxious desire to ingratiate himself with Madame Hanska's family, he often despatched magnificent specimens of the insect species from Paris to add to it.

Balzac travelled about a little with the Hanski family, and remained with them till September 15th, when he was obliged to go back to Paris. Either at this time, or when he returned for the wedding of the Comtesse Anna and the Comte Georges Mniszech, which took place at Wiesbaden on October 13th, 1846, a secret engagement was contracted between him and Madame Hanska.

He was now terribly anxious that there should be no further delay about his marriage, and on his way back from Germany on one of these two occasions, he applied to M. Germeau, then prefect of Metz,† who had been at school with him at Vendôme, to know whether the necessary formalities could be abridged, so that the wedding might take place at once. This was impossible; and though the great obstacle to their union was now removed, Madame Hanska refused to be parted from her beloved daughter, and insisted on accompanying the newly married couple on their honeymoon. Her determination caused Balzac terrible agony of mind, as she was unwell, and was to have had a serious effect on his health, and some words spoken half in malice, half in warning by Madame de Girardin, must have sounded like a knell in his ears. He tells them apparently in jest to Madame Hanska to give her an example of the nonsense people talk in Paris. In his accuracy of repetition, however, we can trace a passionately anxious desire to force Madame Hanska herself to deny the charges brought against her; and perhaps lurking behind this, a wish unacknowledged even to himself, to shame her if—even after all that had passed—she were really not in earnest.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 287.

† See "Une Page Perdue de Honoré de Balzac," p. 276, by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

He says: "Madame de Girardin told me that she heard from a person who knew you intimately, that you were extremely flattered by my homage; that from vanity and pride you made me come wherever you went; that you were very happy to have a man of genius as courier, but that your social position was too high to allow me to aspire to anything else. And then she began to laugh with an ironical laugh, and told me that I was wasting my time running after great ladies, only to fail with them. Hein! Isn't that like Paris!"*

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 295.

The reader of Balzac's life is forced to the sad conclusion that Parisian gossip had on this occasion sketched the situation tolerably correctly; though the truth of the picture was no doubt denied with much indignation by Madame Hanska.

CHAPTER XIV

1846—1848

Balzac buys a house in the Rue Fortunée—Madame Hanska's visit to Paris—Balzac burns her letters—Final breach with Émile de Girardin—Balzac's projects for writing for the theatre—He goes to Wierzchownia—Plan for transporting oaks from Russia to France—Balzac returns to Paris at the eve of the Revolution of 1848—Views on politics—Stands for last time as deputy.

MUCH of Balzac's time, whenever he was in Paris in 1845 and 1846, was taken up with house-hunting; and some of his still unpublished letters to Madame Hanska contain long accounts of the advantages of the different abodes he had visited. He was now most anxious to be permanently settled, as there was no room for his art treasures in the Rue Basse; but as Madame Hanska's tastes had to be consulted as well as his own, it was necessary to be very careful in his choice. However, in October, 1846, he at last found something which he thought would be suitable. This was the villa which had formerly belonged to the financier Beaujon, in the Rue Fortunée, now the Rue Balzac. The house was not large, it was what might now be described as a "bijou residence," but though out of repair, it had been decorated with the utmost magnificence by Beaujon, and Balzac's discriminating eye quickly discerned its æsthetic possibilities.

In front of the house was a long narrow courtyard, the pavement of which was interrupted here and there by flower-beds. This courtyard was bordered by a wall, and above the wall nothing could be seen from the road but a cupola, which formed the domed ceiling of the financier's boudoir. Some of the inside adornments possessed a delightful fitness for the uses to which they were destined. For instance, what could have been a more graceful compliment to the Mniszechs than to lodge them during their visits to Paris, which would of course be frequent, in a set of rooms painted with brilliant exotic butterflies, poised lightly on lovely flowers? Apparently foreseeing, as Balzac remarks, that a "Lepidopterian Georges" would at some time inhabit the mansion, Beaujon had actually provided a beautiful bedroom and a little drawing-room decorated in this way.* It seemed quite providential!

Balzac was very happy superintending the building operations, deciding exactly where his different treasures would look best in his new abode, and hunting for fresh acquisitions to make every detail perfect. Later on, his letters from Russia to his mother when she was taking charge of the house—then furnished and decorated—show how dearly he loved all his household gods, and how well he was acquainted with their peculiarities; how he realised the danger, unless it thought anxiously about the candle ornaments of gilt crystal, which were only to be arranged after the candelabra had been put up in the white drawing-room. In 1846 and 1847, his letters are instinct with the passion of the confirmed collector, who has no thought beyond his bric-à-brac. His excitement is intense because Madame Hanska has discovered that a tea service in his possession is real Watteau, and because he has had the "incredible good fortune" to find a milk jug and a sugar basin to match it exactly. When we remember that the man who thus expresses his delight was in the act of writing "Les Parents Pauvres," and of evoking scenes of touching pathos and gloomy horror, we are once more amazed at the extraordinary versatility of Balzac's mind and genius.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 289.

The deep thinker, the pessimistic believer in the omnipotence of vice and in the helpless suffering of virtue, who drags to light what is horrible from among the dregs of the people, seems to have nothing in common with the charming, playful figure of "le vieux Bilboquet," who gave Madame Hanska's daughter and her son-in-law a big place in his heart, and was never jealous when, avowedly for their sakes, his wishes, feelings, and health were unconsidered; whose servants, hard-worked though they were, adored him; and who never forgot his friends, or failed to help them when adversity fell upon them.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 337.

At the beginning of 1847, peace for a time visited Balzac's restless spirit. In February he went to Germany to fetch Madame Hanska, and leaving the Mniszechs to go back alone to Wierzchownia, she travelled with him to Paris, and remained there till April. It is significant, as the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul remarks,* that during the time of her stay in Paris, when Balzac's mind was no longer disturbed by his constant longing to see her, he accomplished the last serious bout of work in his life, beginning the "Député D'Arcis" in L'Union, "La Cousine Bette" in the Constitutionnel, and "La Dernière Incarnation de Vautrin" in La Presse.

He had other duties at the same time, being occupied with what he calls the most beautiful work of his life, that of preventing "a mother separated from so adorable a child as her Grace the Countess Georges, from dying of grief." He writes to the Mniszechs on February 27th, 1847†: "Our dear adored Atala is in a charming and magnificent apartment (and not too dear). She has a garden; she goes a great deal to the convent" (to see Mlle. Henriette Borel). "I try to distract her and to be as much as possible Anna to heartbroken voice, which brought tears to my eyes, how she could laugh and amuse herself like this, without her 'dear little one.' I allow, dear Zéphirine, that I took the liberty of telling her, that you were amusing yourself enormously without her, with your lord and master, His Majesty the King of the Coleoptera; that I was sure that you were at this time one of the happiest women in the world; and I hope that Gringalet, on whom I drew this bill of exchange, will not contradict me. I have four tolerably strong attractions to bring forward against the thought of you: 1st, the Conservatoire; 2nd, the Opera; 3rd, the Italian Opera; 4th, the Exhibition."

* "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," p. 194.

† "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 312.

Balzac's hands were certainly pleasantly full at this time. His power of writing, which had temporarily deserted him, seemed now to have returned in full vigour; and he had made forty or fifty thousand francs in three months, so was hopeful of paying off his debts, a point on which Madame Hanska wisely laid much stress. She still refused to decide anything definitely about the date of their marriage; but the house was to a great extent her property, and at this time she identified herself completely with Balzac in all the arrangements to do with it. Though he kept on his rooms in the Rue Basse and left his effects there, he moved in April 1847 to the Rue Fortunée, that he might be better able to superintend the building and decorating, and might himself keep watch over his treasures, which must gradually be unpacked and bestowed to the best advantage. About the middle of April he conducted Madame Hanska to Forbach on her way back to Wierzchownia, and himself returned to Paris to finish the house, put his affairs in order, and then follow her to Wierzchownia. There he hoped the wedding would quickly take place, and that Monsieur and Madame Honoré de Balzac would return to Paris, and would live to a ripe old age in married happiness; he writing many masterpieces, she helping with advice, and forming a salon where her social position, cleverness, and charm would surround her with the highest in the land. The prospect was intoxicating; surely no one was ever so near the attainment of his most radiant visions!

On Balzac's return to Paris, however, he was confronted by realities of the most terrible nature.

When he arrived at the Rue Basse, he found to his horror that the lock of his precious casket had been forced, and some of Madame Hanska's letters had been abstracted. It was a case of blackmail, as the thief demanded 30,000 francs, in default of which the letters would at once be handed over to the Czar. If this were to happen, Balzac's hopes of happiness were annihilated, and the consequences to Madame Hanska would be even more serious. Unless approached with the utmost caution, the Czar would certainly refuse his consent to the marriage of a Russian subject with a foreigner, and would be furious if he were to discover a secret love affair between the French novelist and one of his most important subjects. Yet how could Balzac find 30,000 francs ?

Already in the grip of heart disease, the agony he endured at this time took him one stage further down the valley of death. In the end he managed by frightening the thief, to effect the return of the letters without any immediate payment; but the anguish he had passed through, and the thought of the terrible consequences only just evaded, decided him to burn all the letters he had received from Madame Hanska. It was a terrible sacrifice. He describes in an unpublished letter to her his feelings, as he sat by the fire, and watched each letter curl up, blacken, and finally disappear. He had read and re-read them till they had nearly dropped to pieces, had been cheered and comforted by the sight of them when the world had gone badly, and had owned them so long that they seemed part of himself. There was the first of all, the herald of joy, the opening of a new life; and almost as precious at this moment seemed the one which discovered to him the identity of his correspondent, and held out hopes of a speedy meeting. One after another he took them out of the box which had held some of them for many years, and each seemed equally difficult to part with. However, as he wrote to Madame Hanska, he knew that he was doing right in destroying them, and that the painful sacrifice was absolutely necessary.

Meanwhile, Émile de Girardin was naturally becoming impatient about the continuation of "Les Paysans," which he had never received.* He wrote to Balzac at the end of April, 1847, that the printer had been ready for the finish of the book since the November before, and that unless Balzac could produce it in June, the idea of its appearance in La Presse must be given up altogether; and in this case he must ask the author to settle with M. Rouy about the advances of money already made to him. He further remarked, with scathing though excusable distrust in Balzac's fulfilment of his business engagements, that he refused to continue to bring out the work at all, unless he were absolutely certain that it was com pletely written and that no further interruption would ensue. Friendly social relations still subsisted, however, between Balzac and the Girardins, as, about the same time that Émile penned this uncompromising epistle, the following note reached you not wish me to have the glory of having presented you to this English 'Corinne'? Émile tells me that 'La Dernière Incarnation de Vautrin' is admirable. The compositors declare that it is your chef-d'œuvre.

* "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, from which the whole account of Balzac's rupture with Girardin is taken.

"Only till this evening, I implore you.

"DELPHINE GAY DE GIRARDIN."

Balzac, on his side, was now most anxious to finish "Les Paysans," especially as his penniless state at this time would render it most difficult for him to pay back the money advanced to him by La Presse. He was in special difficulties, as he had lately borrowed ten or fifteen thousand francs from the impecunious Viscontis, giving them as guarantee some shares in the unfortunate Chemin de Fer du Nord, and as the railway was a failure, and these shares were a burden instead of a benefit, Balzac was bound in honour to relieve his friends of their troublesome possession, and to pay back what he owed them. This necessity was an additional incentive to action, and Balzac's letters to Madame Hanska about this time, contain several indications of his anxiety about "Les

* "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, p. 262.

Paysans." On June 9th he speaks of his desire bring it to a close; and on the 15th he writes hat he must certainly finish it at once, to avoid he lawsuit with which he has been for so long hreatened by La Presse. However, he seems to have experienced an unconquerable difficulty in its composition, as in that of "Séraphita," the other book about which he had cherished a peculiarly lofty ideal. Therefore in July the termination of "Les Paysans" had not yet reached the office of La Presse, and on the 13th of the month Balzac received the following letter: *

"PARIS, July 13th, 1847.

"'Le Piccinino' will be finished this week. Only seven numbers of 'Les Paysans' are completed in advance. We are therefore at the mercy of an indisposition, of any chance incident, things of which it is necessary for me to see the possibility, and to which I must not expose myself.

"Really you high dignitaries of the periodical are insupportable, and you will manage so cleverly that the periodical will some day fail you completely.

"For my part, my resolution on this matter is taken, and firmly taken, and if I had not a remainder of the account to work out, I would certainly not publish 'Les Paysans,' as I have not received the last line.

"ÉMILE DE GIRARDIN."

* "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, p. 268.

"PARIS, July 13*th*, 1847.

"I only publish 'Les Paysans' because we have an account to settle. Otherwise I certainly should not publish it, and the success of 'La Dernière Incarnation de Vautrin' would certainly not impel me to do it.

"Therefore if you are able without inconvenience to pay back to the Presse what it advanced to you, I will willingly give up 'Les Paysans.' Otherwise I will publish 'Les Paysans,' and will begin on Monday next, the 19th. But I insist that there shall be no interruption. I count on this.

"ÉMILE DE GIRARDIN."

Girardin's bitter resentment is excusable, when we remember that it was in September, 1844, nearly three years before, that Balzac had received 9,000 francs in advance for "Les Paysans." Since then only one number of the promised work had been produced, and the great writer's only explanation for his long delay in finishing the book was the inadequate one, that Dujarier had interrupted "Les Paysans" after the first chapters had been published, to be able to begin Alexandre Dumas' novel "La Reine Margot," before the end of 1844.

In Balzac's reply, written next day, he definitely withdrew "Les Paysans" from publication, and said that he would pay what he owed La Presse within the space of twenty days, and would not charge for what had not yet been printed; though it had been written and composed specially for La Presse, and at the request of the Presse. As to Émile de Girardin's insinuations about the failure of "La Dernière Incarnation de Vautrin," Balzac remarked that this had been written for L'Époque, not for La Presse, and that it had not been necessary for Girardin to purchase it from the moribund journal, unless he had approved of it. Girardin had hurt him on his tenderest point when he branded his works as failures. With pride and bitterness in his heart he went through the accounts with Mr. Rouy, and found that out of the 9,000 francs received from La Presse, he still owed 5,221 francs 85 centimes. How he raised the money it is impossible to guess, but on August 5th he paid 2,500 francs, and on September 1st 2,000 more, so that only 721 francs 85 centimes remained of his debt, and he made his preparations to start for Wierzchownia with his mind at rest.

He heard from Émile de Girardin again, as we shall see later on, but he had seen Madame de Girardin for the last time. She did not forget him, however, and the news of his death was so terrible a shock that she fainted away. She died in 1855, and was deeply mourned by her friends.

Théophile Gautier, in his admiring account of her, says that for some years before her death, she became a prey to depression and discouragement at the conditions surrounding her. It may have been that her brilliant, exciting life led naturally to a partly physical reaction, and that she became too tired by the emotions she had gone through, to adapt herself with buoyancy to the ever variable conditions of existence. At all events she is a refreshing figure in the midst of much that is unsatisfactory—a woman witty, highly gifted, a queen of society, who was yet kindly, generous, and absolutely free from literary jealousy.

Before the middle of September when Balzac left for Wierzchownia, we hear once of him again. He was still dreaming of the theatre as a means of relief from all his embarrassments,* and on a hot day in August, 1847, he went to Bougival, to pay a visit to M. Hostein, the director of the Théâtre Historique, a new theatre which had not yet been opened six months. There, sitting in the shade on the towing path by the river, he unfolded to the manager his design of writing a grand historical drama on Peter I. and Catherine of Russia, to be entitled "Pierre et Cathérine." Nothing was written, it was all still in his head; but he at once sketched the first scene to the manager, and talked with enthusiasm of the enormous success which would be caused by the novelty of introducing the Russian peasant on the stage.

* "Honoré de Balzac," by Edmund Biré.

The play could be written very quickly; and M. Hostein,* carried away by Balzac's extraordinarily persuasive eloquence, already began to reflect about suitable scenery, dresses, and decorations, for the framing of this masterpiece. However, to his disappointment Balzac returned in a few days, to announce that there would be some delay in the production of his play, as he wished to study local colouring on the spot, and was on the point of starting for Russia. He said that when he returned to Paris in the spring, he would bring M. Hostein a completed play, and with this promise the manager was obliged to be satisfied.

Balzac was in an enormous hurry to reach Wierzchownia, and set himself with much energy to the task of finishing the house in the Rue Fortunée. His efforts in this direction were doubtless the reason that the writing of "Pierre et Cathérine" was postponed till the moujik could be studied in his native land. At last, however, the work of decoration was complete, and his mother left in charge, with minute directions about the care of his treasures. He had toiled with breathless haste, and managed after all to start earlier than he had expected. Once on the journey his northern magnet drew him with ever-increasing strength, and regardless of fatigue, he travelled for eight days in succession without stoppage or rest, and arrived ten days before his letter announcing his departure from Paris. The inhabitants of the château were naturally much surprised at his sudden appearance, and Balzac considers that they were touched, or rather—though he does not say this—that She was touched by his empressement.

* "Historiettes et Souvenirs d'un Homme de Théâtre," by M. Hostein.

He was much delighted with his surroundings. Wierzchownia was a palace, and he was interested and amused with the novelty of all he saw. He writes: "We have no idea at home of an existence like this. At Wierzchownia it is necessary to have all the industries in the house: there is a confectioner, a tailor, and a shoemaker."* He was established in a delicious suite of rooms, consisting of a drawing-room, a study, and a bedroom. The study was in pink stucco, with a fireplace in which straw was apparently burnt, magnificent hangings, large windows, and convenient furniture. In this Louvre of a Wierzchownia there were, as Balzac remarks with pleasure, five or six similar suites for guests. Everything was patriarchal. Nobody was bored in this wonderful new life. It was fairy-like, the fulfilment of Balzac's dreams of splendour, an approach of reality to the grandiose blurred visions of his hours of creation. He who rejoiced in what was huge, delighted in the fact that the Count Georges Mniszech had gone to inspect an estate as big as the department of Seine-et-Marne, with the object of dismissing a prevaricating bailiff. It gave him intense satisfaction to record the wonders of this strange new life: to tell those at home of the biting cold, which rendered his pelisse of Siberian fox of no more protection than a sheet of blotting-paper; or to mention casually that all the letters were carried by a Cossack across sixty "verstes" of steppes.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 324.

The Russians were eager to show their admiration of the celebrated French novelist, and Balzac experienced the truth of the adage, that a prophet is not without honour save in his own country. On the journey out the officials were charmingly polite to him, and when he went to Kiev to pay his respects to the Governor-General, and to obtain permission for a lengthy sojourn in Russia, he was overwhelmed with attentions. A rich moujik had read all his books, burnt a candle for him every week to St. Nicholas, and had promised a sum of money to the servants of Madame Hanska's sister, if they could manage that he might see the great man. This atmosphere of adoration was very pleasant to one whose reward in France for the production of masterpieces, seemed sometimes to consist solely in condemnation and obloquy. Balzac enjoyed himself for the time, and rested from his literary labours, except for working at the second part of "L'Envers de l'Histoire Contemporaine," which is called "L'Initié," and writing the play which he had promised Hostein as a substitute for "Pierre et Cathérine."

His ever-active brain had now evolved a plan for transporting sixty thousand oaks to France, from a territory on the Russian frontier belonging to Count Georges Mniszech and his father. He was anxious that M. Surville should undertake the matter, as, after abstruse and careful calculations—which have the puzzling veneer of practicality always observable in Balzac's mad schemes—he considered that 1,200,000 francs might be made out of the affair, and that of course the engineer who arranged the transport would reap some of the benefit. The blocks of wood would be fifteen inches in diameter at the base, and ten at the upper part. They would first be conveyed to Brody, from there by high road to Cracow, and thence they would travel to France by the railway, which would be finished in a few days. Unfortunately, there were no bridges at Cologne over the Rhine, or at Magdeburg over the Elbe; but Balzac was not discouraged by the question of the transhipment of sixty thousand oaks, any more than in his old days in the Rue Lesdiguières, he had been deterred from the idea of having a piano, by the attic being too small for it. M. Surville was to answer categorically, giving a detailed schedule of the costs of carriage and of duty from Cracow to France; and to this, Balzac would add the price of transport from Brody to Cracow. He discounted any natural astonishment his correspondent would feel, at the neglect hitherto of this certain plan for making a fortune, by remarking that the roprietors were Creoles, who worked their settleents by means of moujiks, so that the spirit enterprise was entirely absent.* M. Surville, owever, received this brilliant proposition without nthusiasm, and did not even trouble to write imself about the matter, but sent back an nswer by his wife, that the price of transporting he freight from one railway to another at Breslau, Berlin, Magdeburg, and Cologne, would ender the scheme impossible. Balzac showed nusual docility at this juncture; he was evi-ently already half-hearted about the enterprise, nd remarked that since his first letter he had imself thought of the objections pointed out by M. Surville, and had remembered hearing that forest purchased in Auvergne, had ruined the uyer, owing to the difficulty of transport.

Balzac was very happy at Wierzchownia, though he fulfilment of the great desire of his life seemed till distant. Madame Hanska's hesitation coninued: she considered herself indispensable to her hildren; besides, owing to the unfortunate state f the Chemin de Fer du Nord, Balzac's pecuniary ffairs would certainly be in an embarrassed ondition for the next two years. Living in the ame house with her, seeing her every day, and eeling sure of her affection, and of a certain appy consummation to his long probation, would ot after all have been very painful, except for ne great drawback, which increased continually

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 321.

as time went on; and that was the terrible effect of the inclement climate on Balzac's health. He had suffered from heart disease for some years, and in a letter to his sister, he traces its origin to the cruelty of the lady about whom she knows —possibly Madame de Castries. His abuse of coffee, however, and the unnatural life which he had led with the object of straining the tension of every power to its uttermost, and thus of forcing the greatest possible quantity and quality of literary work out of himself, had done much to ruin his robust constitution. Nevertheless, if he had been able to take up his abode with his wife in the Rue Fortunée, and to enjoy the freedom from anxiety which her fortune would have assured to him; if he had been happy with her, and surrounded by his beautiful things, had at last lived the life for which he had so long yearned, it seems as though several years at least might have remained to him. The enormous labours of his earlier years would indeed have been impossible,* but "Les Parents Pauvres" had shown that his intellect was now at its best, and material for many masterpieces was still to be found in that capacious brain and fertile imagination. However, the rigours of the Russian climate, aided no doubt by the privations and anxieties Balzac suffered in Paris after the Revolution of 1848, and by the barbarous treatment which he underwent at the hands of the doctor

* "Balzac, sa Vie, son Œuvre," by Julien Lemer.

Wierzchownia, rendered his case hopeless; and his time only one more stone was destined to id on the unfinished edifice of the "Comédie maine."

n February, 1848, it was absolutely necessary Balzac should go to Paris, as money must nce be found, to meet the calls which the ted Chemin de Fer du Nord was making on shareholders. Balzac suffered terribly from on the journey, and arrived at the Rue tunée at a most unfortunate time, just before Revolution of February, 1848.

n consequence of the disturbed state of the tical atmosphere, the outlook for literature tragic; and Balzac, who was in immediate t of money, found himself in terrible straits. ing with two servants in his luxurious little se, surrounded by works of art which had thousands of francs, he was almost dying of ger. His food consisted of boiled beef, which cooked and eaten hot once a week, and the aining six days he subsisted on the cold ains. It seemed impossible to raise money his present pressing necessities. He managed sell "L'Initié," * at a ridiculously small price, an ephemeral journal called Le Spectateur ublicain, but only received in return bills at ng date, and it is doubtful whether he was r paid the money due to him.

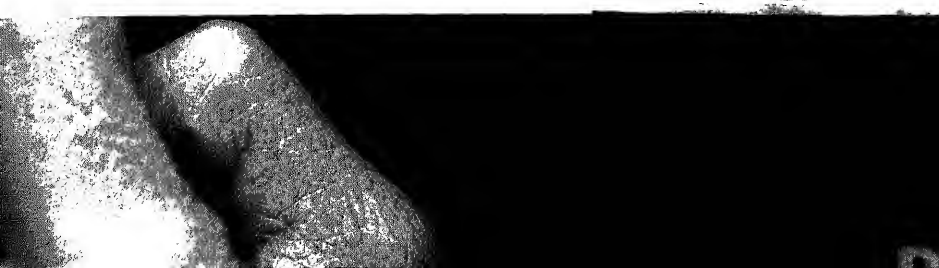

* "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch venjoul.

hearty fits of laughter, and his confident plans for the future. Lemer, who had known him before, does indeed remark that he seemed much aged; but Champfleury, who saw him for the first time, is only struck with his strength, animal spirits, and keen intelligence. In the midst of the despondent unhealthy tendencies of the literary talent of his day, he was still, with his joie de vivre, a man apart. Naïf, full of a charming pride, he loved literature "as the Arab loves the wild horse he has found a difficulty in subduing." Nevertheless, material prosperity, as ever, occupied an important place in the foreground of his scheme of life, and his mind was still running on the theatre, as the great means of gaining money. He warned Champfleury not to follow his example, which led after the production of many books to an existence of deplorable poverty, but to write only three novels a year, so that ten months annually should be left for making a fortune by working for the theatre, "car il faut que l'artiste mène une vie splendide." †

Schemes still coursed each other through his quick-moving brain. He wished to create an

* "Balzac, sa Vie, son Œuvre," by Julien Lemer.

† "Grandes Figures d'Hier et d'Aujourd'hui," by Champfleury.

ociation of all the great dramatists of the day, should enrich the French stage with plays mposed in common. He was rather despondent out this, however, as he said that most writers re cowardly and idle, and he was afraid they uld therefore refuse to join his society. Scribe the only one who would work; "Mais quelle érature que 'Les Mémoires d'un Colonel de ussards!'" he exclaimed in horror.* Another n for becoming colossally rich of which he ked seriously, was to gain a monopoly of all e arts, and to act as auctioneer to Europe: to the Apollo Belvedere, for instance, let all the tions compete for it against each other, and then sell to the highest bidder.

He took a gloomy view of the political situation, cause, though he had a great admiration for amartine, he feared that the poet would not have fficient strength of mind, to take advantage of e great majority he would doubtless have in the t Assemblée Constituante, and to make himself e chief of a strong government, when he might stify his magnificent rôle, by presiding at the complishment of the great social and administra- ve reforms, demanded by justice, and material, oral, and intellectual progress. In one of his marks was a touch of sadness. He told Lemer at, at the present crisis, all authors should crifice their writing for a time, and throw emselves with energy into politics. "Et pour cela il faut être jeune," he added with a sigh; "et moi, je suis vieux!"

* "Notes Historiques sur M. de Balzac," by Champfleury.

However, on March 18th, 1848, a letter written by him appeared in the Constitutionnel, in which he stated that he would stand as deputy if requested to do so.* In consequence, the "Club de la Fraternité Universelle" wrote to inform him that his name had been put on the list of candidates for election, and invited him to explain his political views at a meeting of the Club. In the Constitutionnel of April 19th Balzac answered this request by refusing to go to the meeting, and at the same time announced that he had no intention of canvassing, and wished to owe his election solely to votes not asked for, but given voluntarily. He further commented on the fact that from 1789 to 1848 France had changed its constitution every fifteen years, and asked if it were not time, "for the honour of our country, to find, to found, a form, an empire, a durable government; so that our prosperity, our commerce, our arts, which are the life of our commerce, the credit, the glory, in short, all the fortune of France, shall not be periodically jeopardised?"

Naturally, these uncompromising views did not meet with favour from the "citoyens membres du Club de la Fraternité Universelle," and Balzac was not elected a member of the Assemblée Nationale.

* "Honoré de Balzac," by Edmond Biré.

CHAPTER XV

1848—1849

Description of interior of house in the Rue Fortunée—"La Marâtre"—Projected plays—"Le Faiseur"—Balzac seeks admission for the last time to the Académie Française—He returns to Wierzchownia—Failing health—Letters to his family—Family relations are strained.

DURING his stay in Paris, which lasted from February till the end of September, Balzac was careful not to admit any strangers to the mysterious little house in the Rue Fortunée. Even his trusted friends were only shown the magnificence of his residence with strict injunctions about secrecy, so afraid was he that the news of his supposed riches should reach the ears of his creditors. He was only the humble custodian, he said, of all these treasures. Nothing belonged to him; he was poorer than ever, and was only taking charge of the house for a friend. This was difficult to believe, and his acquaintances, who had always been sceptical about his debts, laughed, and said to his delight, yet annoyance, that he was in reality a millionaire, and that he kept his fortune in old stockings.

Théophile Gautier, after remarking how difficult it was to gain an entrance to this carefully-guarded abode, describes it thus: "He received us, however, one day, and we were able to see a dining-room panelled in old oak, with a table, mantelpiece, buffets, sideboards, and chairs in carved wood, which would have made a Berruguete, a Cornejo Duque, or a Verbruggen envious; a drawing-room hung with gold-coloured damask, with doors, cornices, plinths, and embrasures of ebony; a library ranged in cupboards inlaid with tortoiseshell and copper in the style of Buhl; a bathroom in yellow breccia, with bas-reliefs in stucco; a domed boudoir, the ancient paintings of which had been restored by Edmond Hédouin; and a gallery lighted from the top, which we recognised later in the collection of 'Cousin Pons.' On the shelves were all sorts of curiosities—Saxony and Sèvres porcelain, sea-green horns with cracked glazing; and on the staircase which was covered with a carpet, were great china vases, and a magnificent lantern suspended by a cable of red silk."*

The gallery, the holy of holies of this temple of Art, where the treasures laboriously collected and long concealed, were at last assembled, is described exactly in "Le Cousin Pons." It was a large oblong room, lighted from the top, the walls painted in white and gold, but "the white yellowed, the gold reddened by time, gave harmonious tones which did not spoil the effect of the canvases."†

* "Portraits Contemporains: Honoré de Balzac," by Théophile Gautier.

† "Le Cousin Pons," by Honoré de Balzac.

There were fourteen statues in this gallery mounted on Buhl pedestals, and all round the walls were richly decorated ebony buffets containing objets d'art, while in the centre stood carved wooden cases, which showed to great advantage some of the greatest rarities in human work—costly jewellery, and curiosities in ivory, bronze, wood, and enamel. Sixty-seven pictures adorned the walls of this magnificent apartment, among them the four masterpieces, the loss of which is the most tragic incident in the melancholy story of poor old Pons. They were a "Chevalier de Malte en Prière," by Sebastian del Piombo; a "Holy Family," by Fra Bartolommeo; a "Landscape," by Hobbema; and a "Portrait of a Woman," by Albert Dürer. Apparently they were in reality mediocre as works of art, but they were a source of the utmost pride and delight to their owner, who said enthusiastically of one of them—the Sebastian del Piombo—that "human art can go no further." When we know that in the novel Balzac is speaking of his own cherished possessions, we think of his own words, "Ideas project themselves with the same force by which they are conceived,"* and can understand the reason of the positive pain we feel, when the poor old Cousin Pons is bereft of his treasures. The great voyant was transported by his powerful imagination into the personality of the old musician, and the heartrending situation he had evoked must have been torture to him; though with the courage and conscientiousness of the true artist he did not hesitate in the task he had set himself, but ever darkened and deepened the shadows of his tragedy towards the close.

* "Le Père Goriot," by Honoré de Balzac.

It is not surprising to hear that this sumptuous house cost 400,000 francs, but it is astonishing, and it gives the inhabitant of steady-going England an idea of the inconvenience of revolutions, that its owner and occupant should in 1848 have been starving in the midst of magnificence, and that it should have been impossible for him to find a purchaser for some small curiosity, if he had wished to sell it to buy bread. Part of the cost of the house had been defrayed by Madame Hanska, but Balzac had evidently overstepped her limits, and had involved himself seriously in debt. One of the alleged reasons given by the lady for the further deferment of her promise to become Madame Honoré de Balzac, was the state of embarrassment to which Balzac had reduced himself by his expenditure in decoration; and, in his despair and disgust, the home he had been so happily proud of, and which seemed destined never to be occupied, soon became to him "that rascally plum box."

At this time, however, he was still tasting the joys of ownership, and was, as usual, hopeful about the future. His dreams of theatrical success seemed at last destined to come true.* Hostein, who had rushed to the Rue Fortunée as soon as he heard of the arrival of the great man, to ask for the play promised him in place of "Pierre et Cathérine," found Balzac as usual at his desk, and was presented with a copy-book on which was written in large characters, "Gertrude, tragédie bourgeoise." The play was read next day in Balzac's drawing-room to Hostein, Madame Dorval, and Mélingue; and Hostein accepted it under the name of "La Marâtre," Madame Dorval expressing much objection to its first title. Eventually, to Madame Dorval's and to Balzac's disappointment, Madame Lacressonière, who had much influence with Hostein, was entrusted with the heroine's part; and the tragedy was produced at the Théâtre-Historique on May 25th, 1848. In spite of the disturbed state of the political atmosphere, which was ruinous to the theatres, the play met with considerable success; and the critics began to realise that when once Balzac had mastered the métier of the theatre, he might become a great dramatist. About this time, Cogniard, the director of the Porte-Saint-Martin, received a letter with fifty signatures, asking for a second performance of "Vautrin." He communicated this request to Balzac, who stipulated that if "Vautrin" were again put on the stage, all caricature of Louis Philippe should be avoided by the actor who played the principal part. He added that when he wrote the play he had never intended any political allusion. However, "Vautrin" was not acted till April, 1850, when, without Balzac's knowledge, it was produced at the Gaîté. Balzac, who heard of this at Dresden, on his journey to Paris from Russia, wrote to complain of the violation of his dramatic rights, and in consequence the play was withdrawn from the boards of the Gaîté.

* "Honoré de Balzac," by Edmond Biré.

During his stay in Paris in 1848, Balzac sketched out the plots of many dramas. The director of the Odéon, in despair at the emptiness of his theatre after the political crisis of June, offered Victor Hugo, Dumas, and Balzac * a premium of 6,000 francs, and a royalty on all receipts exceeding 4,000 francs, if they would produce a play for his theatre; and in response to this offer Balzac promised "Richard Sauvage," which he never wrote. The manager of the Théâtre Français, M. Lockroy, also made overtures to the hitherto despised dramatist; and Balzac thought of providing him with a comedy entitled "Les Petits Bourgeois," but abandoned the idea. "Is it," he wrote to Hippolyte Rolle, "the day after a battle when the bourgeoisie have so generously shed their blood for menaced civilisation; is it at the time when they are in mourning, that they should be represented on the stage?" †

At this time, however, Balzac had in his portfolio a play quite ready to be acted—one which had several times changed its title, being called by its author successively "Mercadet," "Le Spéculateur," and "Le Faiseur." It was read and accepted by the Comédie Française on August 17th,

* "Honoré de Balzac," by Edmund Biré.

† "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 332.

48, under the name of "Le Faiseur"; and when lzac returned to Russia at the end of September, asked his friend Laurent-Jan to take charge the comedy during his absence. Evidently he ard that matters were not going very smoothly, in December he wrote to Laurent-Jan from ierzchownia to say that if the Comédie Française used "Mercadet"—which had been "reçue à nanimité" on August 17th—it might be offered Frédérick Lemaître; and a few days later, aring that the piece was "reçue seulement à rections," by the Comédie Française, he with-ew it altogether. "Le Faiseur" or "Mercadet" s then offered to the Théâtre Historique, and lzac already saw in imagination his sister and his nieces attending the first night's performance, cked out in their most elegant toilettes. As was in Russia, and his mother did not go to e theatre, they would be the sole representatives the family; and Hostein must therefore provide em with one of the best boxes in the theatre.
there were hissings and murmurings, as Balzac pected from past experiences, his younger niece alentine would be indignant; but Sophie would ll preserve her dignity, "and you, my dear sister.
. But what can a box do against a theatre?" Nevertheless, though Hostein accepted "Le aiseur," he announced that his clients preferred elodrama to comedy, and that, in order to fit it r his "théâtre de boulevard," the play would quire modifications which would completely change its character. Balzac naturally objected to these proposed alterations, as they sounded infinitely more sweeping than the "corrections" of the Comédie Française, and the play was never acted during his life. On August 23rd, 1851, however, as we have already seen, "Mercadet le Faiseur," with certain modifications made by M. Dennery, and also with omissions—for the play as Balzac originally wrote it was too long for the theatre—was received with tremendous acclamations at the Gymnase; and on October 22nd, 1868, it was acted at the Comédie Française, and again in 1879 and in 1890.

Mercadet, first played by Geoffroy, who conceived Balzac's creation admirably, and at the Comédie Française less successfully by Got, is a second Figaro, with a strong likeness to Balzac himself. He is continually on the stage, and keeps the audience uninterruptedly amused by his wit, good-humour, hearty bursts of laughter, and ceaseless expedients for baffling his creditors. The action of the play is simple and natural, and the dialogue scintillates with bon mots, gaiety, and amusing sallies. The play had been conceived and even written in 1839 or 1840, and never did Balzac's imperishable youth shine out more brilliantly than in its execution. It is curious to notice that his innate sense of power as a dramatist, which never deserted him, even when he seemed to have found his line in quite a different direction, was in the end amply justified.

His vivacity and hopefulness never forsook him long. Even in his terrible state of health in 49, and in spite of his disappointment at the n-appearance of "Le Faiseur," he was in buoyant its, and informed his sister in one of his letters, at he was sending a comedy, "Le Roi des endiants," to Laurent-Jan, as soon as he could nage to transport it to St. Petersburg. There, e French Ambassador would be entrusted with e charge of despatching it to Paris, as manu- pts were not allowed to travel by post.* out three weeks later,† he wrote to ask his other to tell Madame Dorval that he was eparing another play, with a great rôle in it signed specially for her. However, owing to lzac's failing health the drama never took form, d Madame Dorval died on April 20th, 1849, about ee weeks after his letter was despatched.

At the time of his stay in the Rue Fortunée in 48, he was, however, satisfied about "Mercadet," ich had, as we have seen, been accepted by the médie Française; and the production of which uld help, he doubtless hoped, to relieve him from monetary difficulties. Ready money was an er-pressing necessity. Émile de Girardin, in his litical activity during the Revolution of 1848, d not forgotten his personal resentments, and on after Balzac's arrival in Paris he requested m to pay at once the 721 francs 85 centimes which he still owed *La Presse. This Balzac could not possibly do, and most probably he forgot all about the matter. Not so his antagonist, who on October 7th, 1848, after Balzac had returned to Russia, demanded immediate payment; and four days afterwards applied to the Tribunal of the Seine for an order that the debt should be paid from the future receipts of "Le Faiseur," which was at that time in rehearsal at the Théâtre Français. This demand was granted, but as after all the play was withdrawn, Émile de Girardin did not receive his money. However, he was paid in the end, as he wrote Balzac a receipt dated December 30th, 1848, for 757 francs 75 centimes, a sum which included legal expenses as well as the original debt.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 393.

† Ibid., vol. ii. p. 397.

There were to be two elections to the Académie Française in January, 1849, as M. Chateaubriand's and M. Vatout's armchairs were both vacant; and Balzac determined again to try his fortune. He wrote the required letter before his departure to Russia, and this was read at a meeting of the illustrious Forty on October 5th, 1848.† Apparently, Balzac's absence from France, which prevented him from paying the prescribed visits, militated against his chances of success, as his ardent supporter, M. Vacquerie, wrote in L'Événement of January 9th, 1849: "Balzac is now in ussia. How can he be expected to pay visits? e will not become a member of the Académie ecause he has not been in Paris? And when osterity says, "He wrote 'Splendeurs et Misères es Courtisanes,' 'Le Père Goriot,' 'Les Parents auvres,' and 'Les Treize,'" the Académie will nswer: "Yes, but he went on a journey."

* "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

† "Honoré de Balzac," by Edmund Biré.

At the first election, which took place on anuary 11th, 1849, the Duc de Noailles was at e head of the list, with twenty-five papers in his vour, and Balzac received two; at the second, n January 18th, when M. de Saint-Priest was the uccessful candidate, two members of the Academy gain voted for Balzac at the first round of the allot, but at the third and deciding round his ame was not included at all. Balzac wrote to aurent-Jan to ask for the names of his supporters, as he wished to thank them; and about he same time, in a letter to his brother-law, M. Surville, he let it be understood hat he would never again present himself as a andidate for admission to the Académie rançaise, as he intended to put that body in he wrong.

This is anticipation; we must return to the nd of September, 1848, when Balzac, after having rranged the necessary business matters, hurried ack to Madame Hanska. For the better guardianip of his treasures, he left his mother with two ervants installed in the Rue Fortunée, and he xpected to return to Paris by the beginning of 1849. His family did not hear from him for more than a month after his arrival, when his mother received a letter full, as usual, of directions and commissions, but giving no news of his own doings. He was evidently ill at the time he wrote, and a few days afterwards was seized with acute bronchitis, and was obliged to put off his projected return to Paris.

Balzac's health all through the winter was deplorable, and under the direction of the doctor at Wierzchownia, he went through a course of treatment for his heart and lungs, This doctor was a pupil of the famous Franck, the original of Benassis in the "Médecin de Campagne," and Balzac appears to have had complete faith in him, and to have been much impressed by his dictum, that French physicians, though the first in the world for diagnosis, were quite ignorant of curative methods. Balzac's passion at this time for everything Russian, must have been peculiarly trying to his family. It surely seemed to them madness that he should separate himself from his country, should gradually see less and less of his friends, and should show an inclination to be ashamed of his relations, for the sake of a woman crippled with rheumatism, and no longer young, who, however passionately she may have loved him in the past, seemed now to have grown tired of him. Sophie and Valentine Surville were no doubt delighted to receive magnificent silk wraps from their uncle, trimmed with Russian fur; but the etter accompanying the gift must, we think, ıave rather spoiled their pleasure, or at any rate vas likely to have hurt their mother's feelings. It as surely hardly necessary to inform "ma pauvre Sophie" that it was in vain for her to compete with he Countess Georges in proficiency on the piano, s the latter had "the genius of music, as of love"; ınd a long string of that wonderful young lady's erfections must have been rather wearying to those vho had not the felicity of being acquainted with ıer. Apparently the young Countess possessed leep knowledge without pedantry, and was of de- icious naïveté, laughing like a little child; though his did not prevent her from showing religious enthusiasm about beautiful things. Further, she vas of angelic goodness, intensely observant, yet extremely discreet, most respectful to her adored nother, very industrious, and she lived only for duty. "All these advantages are set off by a proud air, full of good breeding, an air of ease ınd grandeur which is not possessed by every queen, and which is quite lost in France, where every one wishes to be equal. This outward distinction, this look of being a great lady, is one of the most precious gifts which God, the God of women, can bestow on them."* To paint er character aright, Balzac says, it would be ecessary to blend in one word virtues which a oralist would consider it impossible to find united n a single human being; and her "sublime education" was a crown to the whole edifice of her perfections.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 345.

The only consolation which an impartial though possibly unprincipled observer, might have offered at this point to the unfortunate Sophie and Valentine, would be the fact that the young Countess was evidently extremely plain, as even Balzac's partiality only allows him to say: "Physically she possesses grace, which is more beautiful even than beauty, and this triumphs over a complexion which is still brown (she is hardly sixteen years old), and over a nose which, though well cut, is only charming in the profile."

Let us hope, however, that our pity is after all wasted on the nieces, and that in their joy at the idea of receiving handsome presents, they either skipped the unwelcome portions of their distinguished uncle's letter, or that, knowing the cause of his raptures, if they did read, they laughed and understood.

His Polar Star is seldom mentioned by name in Balzac's letters; she is generally "the person with whom I am staying," and he says little about her, except that she is very much distressed at the amount of his debts, and that the great happiness of his life is constantly deferred. Two fires had taken place on the estate, and the Countess was in addition burdened with three lawsuits: one about some property which should have come to her from an uncle, and about which it would be necessary for her to go to St. Petersburg. Balzac's letters as usual abound in allusions to his monetary difficulties, while the Survilles had been almost ruined by the Revolution of 1848, so that the outlook for the family was black on all sides.

All this time Balzac's relations were becoming more and more discontented with his doings, as well as with the general aspect of his affairs. Honoré was evidently pursuing a chimera, and because of his illusions, many burdens were imposed on them. Madame de Balzac the principal sufferer, was tired of acting as custodian at the Rue Fortunée, where she was expected to teach François how to clean the lamps, and received careful instructions about wrapping the gilt bronzes in cotton rags. It seemed as though her son were permanently swallowed up by that terrible Russia, about which, as he remarked impatiently, she would never understand anything; and she longed to retire to her little lodgings at Suresnes, and to do as she pleased. Laure, too, had her grievances, though possibly she kept them to herself and strove to act as peacemaker. She and her family were in terrible monetary straits, and the sight of the costly house, which seemed destined never to be occupied, must have been slightly exasperating. She was quite willing to be useful to Honoré, and did not mind when troublesome commissions were entrusted to her; but it was no doubt galling to notice that—though her daughters were expected to write continually, and were supposed to be amply rewarded for their labours, by hearing of the delight with which the young Countess listened to their letters—a strong motive lurking behind Balzac's anxiety to hear often from his family, was the desire to impress Madame Hanska favourably with the idea of their affection for himself, and their unity. At the same time, a sad presentiment warned her, that if ever her brother were married to this great lady, his family and friends would see little more of him. The prospect cannot have been very cheerful to poor Laure, as either Honoré would return to France brokenhearted and overwhelmed with debt, or he would gain his heart's desire, and would be lost to his family.

The tone of Balzac's letters to his relations at this time has been adversely criticised, and it is true that the reader is sometimes irritated by the frequency of his requests for service from them, and his continual insistence on the wonderful perfections of the Hanski family, and their grandeur and importance. Occasionally, too, his letters show an irritability which is a new feature in his character. We must remember, however, in judging Balzac, that he was nearly driven wild by the position in which he found himself. It was necessary that he should always be bright, good-natured, and agreeable to the party at Wierzchownia, and his letters to his family were therefore the only safety-valve for the impatience and despair, which, though he never utters a word of reproach against Madame Hanska, must sometimes have taken possession of him.

His was a terrible dilemma. Ill and suffering, so that he was not able to work to diminish his load of debt, desperately in love with a cold-hearted woman, who used these debts as a lever for postponing what on her side was certainly an undesirable marriage; and enormously proud, so that failure in his hopes would mean to him not only a broken heart, but also almost unbearable mortification; Balzac, crippled and handicapped, with his teeth set hard, his powers concentrated on one point, that of winning Madame Hanska, was at times hardly master of himself. There was indeed some excuse for his irritation, when his family wrote something tactless, or involved themselves in fresh misfortunes, just as matters perhaps seemed progressing a little less unfavourably than usual. Their letters were always read aloud at the lunch table at Wierzchownia, and often, alas! their perusal served to prove anew to Madame Hanska, the mistake she had made in contemplating an alliance with a member of a family so peculiarly unlucky and undesirable.

At last the smouldering indignation between Balzac and his relations burst into a flame. The immediate cause of ignition was a letter from Madame de Balzac, complaining that Honoré had not written sufficiently often to her; and further, that he did not answer his nieces' epistles. These reproaches were received with much indignation, as Balzac remarked in his answer, which was dated February, 1849, that he had written seven times to his mother since his return to Wierzchownia in September, and that he did not like to send letters continually, because they were franked by his hosts. He goes on to say rather sadly, that it will not do for him to trespass on the hospitality offered him, because, though he has been royally and magnificently received, he has still no rights but those of a guest. On the subject of his neglect to write to his nieces, he is very angry, and cries in an outburst of irritability: "It seems strange to you that I do not write to my nieces. It is you, their grandmother, who have such ideas on family etiquette! You consider that your son, fifty years old, is obliged to write to his nieces! My nieces ought to feel very much honoured and very happy when I address a few words to them; certainly their letters are nice, and always give me pleasure." * A postscript to the letter contains the words: "Leave the house in the Rue Fortunée as little as possible, I beg you, because, though François is good and faithful, he is not very clever, and may easily do stupid things."

Balzac followed this with another letter, which apparently impressed on his mother that to please the Wierzchownia family she must behave very well to him; and this communication naturally annoyed Madame de Balzac even more than the preceding one.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 373.

In reply, she wrote a severe reprimand to her son, in which she addressed him as "vous," and remarked that her affection in future would depend on his conduct. In fact, as Balzac wrote hotly to Laure, it was the letter of a mother scolding a small boy, and he was fifty years old! Unfortunately, too, it arrived during the déjeûner, and Balzac cried out impulsively, "My mother is angry with me!" and then was forced to read the letter to the party assembled. It made a very bad impression, as it showed that either he was a bad son, or his mother an extremely difficult person to get on with. Fate had chosen an unfavourable moment for the arrival of this missive, which, later on, when her wrath had abated, Madame de Balzac announced that she had written partly in jest. Balzac had at last been allowed to write to St. Petersburg, to beg the Czar's permission for his marriage with Madame Hanska, and this had been very decidedly refused. Madame Hanska was not at this time prepared to hand over her capital to her daughter, and thus to take the only step, which would have induced her Sovereign to authorise her to leave his dominions. She therefore talked of breaking off the engagement, and of sending Balzac to Paris, to sell everything in the Rue Fortunée. She was tired of struggling; and in Russia she was rich, honoured, and comfortable, whereas she trembled to think of the troublous life which awaited her as Madame Honoré de Balzac.

Madame de Balzac's letter further strengthened her resolve. Apparently, in addition to evidence about family dissensions, it contained disquieting revelations about the discreditable Henri, and the necessity for supporting the Montzaigle grandchildren; and the veil with which Balzac had striven to soften the aspect of the family skeletons was violently withdrawn. He was in despair. At this juncture his mother's communication was fatal! She had done irreparable mischief!

The long letter he wrote to Madame Surville,* imploring her to act as peacemaker, and insisting on the benefits which his marriage would bring to the whole family, would be comical were it not for the writer's real trouble and anxiety; and the reader's knowledge that, underlying the common-sense worldly arguments—which were brought forward in the hope of inducing his family to help him by all the means in their power—was real romantic love for the woman who had now been his ideal for sixteen years.

He put the case to Madame Surville as if it were her own, and asked what her course would be if she were rich, and Sophie an heiress with many suitors. Sophie, according to her uncle's hypothesis, was in love with a young sculptor; and her parents had permitted an engagement between the two. The sculptor, however, came to live in the same house with his fiancée, and his family wrote him letters which he showed to Madame Surville, containing damaging revelations about family matters. As a culminating indiscretion, his mother wrote to this sculptor, "who is David, or Pradier, or Ingres," a letter in which she treated him like a street boy. What would Laure do in these circumstances? Balzac asks. Would he not in disgust dismiss the sculptor, and choose a more eligible parti for Sophie? "Unsatisfactory marriages," he remarks sagely, "are easily made; but satisfactory ones require infinite precautions and scrupulous attention, or one does not get married; and I am at present most likely to remain a bachelor." *

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 378.

He appeals to Madame Surville's self-interest. 'Reflect on the fact, my dear Laure, that not one of us can be said to have arrived at our goal, and that if, instead of being obliged to work in order to live, I were to become the husband of a most intellectual, well born and highly connected woman, with a solid though small fortune—in spite of this woman's desire to remain in her own country and to make no new relations, even family ones—I should be in a much more favourable position to be useful to you all. I know that Madame Hanska would show kindness to and feel keen interest in your dear little ones."

Surely, he says, it will be an advantage to the whole family, when he has a salon presided over by a beautiful, clever woman, imposing as a queen, where he can assemble the élite of Parisian society. He does not wish to be tyrannical or overbearing with his family, but he informs them that it will be of no use to place themselves in opposition to such a woman. He warns them that she and her children will never forgive those who blame him to them. Further on in his lengthy epistle, he gives instructions in deportment, and tells his relations that in their intercourse with Madame Hanska they must not show servility, haughtiness, sensitiveness, or obsequiousness; but must be natural, simple, and affectionate. It was no wonder that the Balzac family disliked Madame Hanska! And the poor woman cannot be considered responsible for the feeling evoked!

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 328.

Towards the end of his letter, however, the reader forgives Balzac, and realises that the cry of a desperate man, ill and suffering, yet still clinging with determined strength to the hope which means everything to him, must not be criticised minutely. "Once everything is lost, I shall live no longer; I shall content myself with a garret like that of the Rue Lesdiguières, and shall only spend a hundred francs a month. My heart, soul, and ambition will be satisfied with nothing but the object I have pursued for sixteen years: if this immense happiness escapes me, I shall no longer want anything, and shall refuse everything!"

CHAPTER XVI

1849—1850

ace renewed between Balzac and his family—He thinks of old friends—Madame Hanska's continued vacillations—Dr. Knothe's treatment—Madame Hanska's relations with Balzac, and her ignorance about his illness—Visit to Kiev—Balzac's marriage—His letters to his mother, sister, and to Madame Carraud—Delay in starting for France—Terrible journey—Madame Honoré de Balzac's pearl necklace and strange letter—Balzac's married life—Arrival of the newly-married couple in Paris.

HE quarrel between Balzac and his family was uickly made up, and it was settled that his other should—if she wished to do so—return at nce to Suresnes; and come up every day to the ue Fortunée, taking carriages for this purpose Balzac's expense. However, having made a nall commotion, and asserted her dignity by the nnouncement that she felt perfectly free to leave e Rue Fortunée whenever she chose to do so, adame de Balzac's resentment was satisfied; and e remained there till a month before Balzac's turn in May, 1850, when illness necessitated her moval to her daughter's house.* The nieces, whom Balzac was really extremely fond, sulked" no longer, but wrote letters which their uncle praised highly, and which he answered gaily and amusingly. The shadowy cloud, too, which had prevented the brother and sister from seeing each other clearly, dispersed for ever; and one of Honoré's letters to Laure about this time contains the loving words, "As far as you are concerned, every day is your festival in my heart, companion of my childhood, and of my bright as well as of my gloomy days." *

* "Une Page perdue de Honoré de Balzac" by the Vicomte de oelberch de Lovenjoul.

It is curious to notice that Balzac's thoughts now turned to those faithful friends of his youth, who had in late years passed rather into the background of his life. He wrote a long letter to Madame Delannoy, who had been a mother to him in the struggling days of his half-starved youth. He had paid off the debt he owed her, but he said he would never be able to thank her adequately for her tenderness and goodness to him. He thought also of Dablin, his early benefactor; and he remembered the old days at Frapesle, and wrote Madame Carraud a most affectionate letter, sending messages of remembrance to Borget and to the Commandant Carraud, and inquiring about his old acquaintance Périollas. The Carrauds, like others in those revolutionary days, had lost money; and Balzac explained that though owing to his illness he had been forbidden to write, he felt obliged to disobey his doctor's commands, that Madame Carraud should not believe that true friends can ever fail each other in trouble. He ays: "I have never ceased thinking about you, oving you, talking of you, even here, where they ave known Borget since 1833. . . . How different fe is from the height of fifty years, and how far e are often from our hopes! . . . How many bjects, how many illusions have been thrown verboard! and except for the affection which ontinues to grow, I have advanced in nothing!"* The annals of this last year of Balzac's life, re a record of constantly disappointed hope and f physical suffering. One after another he was orced to give up his many plans, and to remain n suffering inaction. He had intended to go to Kiev to present himself to the Governor General, ut this expedition was put off from month to nonth owing to his ill health. A visit to Moscow n his way back to Paris, was another project hich had to be abandoned, as he was never ell enough to make his proposed visit to France, ll he took his last painful and difficult journey n April, 1850, and sight-seeing was then impos- ble. His hopefulness, however, never left him, nd his projected enterprises, whether they took ne shape of writings or of travels, were in his yes only deferred, never definitely relinquished. he wearing uncertainty about Madame Hanska's ntentions was the one condition of his life which ontinued always, if continuance can be considered pplicable to anything so variable as that lady's noods. In April, 1849, Balzac wrote to his sister:

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 420.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 422.

"No one knows what the year 1847, and February, 1848, and above all the doubt as to what my fate will be, have cost me!" *

Sometimes, Madame Hanska, cruelly regardless of the agony she caused the sick man by her heedless words, would threaten to break off the engagement altogether. On other occasions, Balzac would write to his family to say that, for reasons which he was unable to give in his letters, the question of the marriage was postponed indefinitely; and once he made the resolution that he would not leave Wierzchownia till the affair was settled in one way or another. In a crisis of his terrible malady he wrote: "Whatever happens, I shall come back in August. One must die at one's post. . . . How can I offer a life as broken as mine! I must make my situation clear to the incomparable friend who for sixteen years has shone on my life like a beneficent star." †

The relations between Balzac and Madame Hanska at this time are mysterious. He shows his usual caution in his letters to his family, and the reader is conscious that much was passing at Wierzchownia, on which Balzac is absolutely silent, and that many events that he does record are carefully arranged with the intention of conveying certain impressions to his hearers. One of his motives is clear. He was nervously afraid that gossip about his secret engagement, and possibly approaching marriage, should be spread abroad prematurely; and that the report might either frighten Madame Hanska into dismissing him altogether, or might reach the ears of her relations, and cause them to remonstrate with her anew on the folly of her proceedings.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 392.

† Ibid., vol. ii. p. 401.

Other discrepancies are puzzling. All through 1849 Balzac, as we have seen, was very ill. He was suffering from aneurism of the heart, a complaint which the two doctors Knothe told him they could cure. With perfect faith in their powers, Balzac wrote to his sister expressing regret that, owing to the ignorance of the French doctors Roulié had been allowed to die of this malady, when he might have been saved if Dr. Knothe's treatment had been followed. The younger doctor, however, soon gave up Balzac's case as hopeless; but the father, who was very intimate with the Wierzchownia family, always expressed himself confidently about his patient's ultimate recovery; and Balzac wrote: "What gratitude I owe to his doctor! He loves violins: when once I am at Paris I must find a Stradivarius to present to him."*

Dr. Knothe's principal prescription was pure lemon juice. This was to be taken twice a day, to purify and quicken the circulation of the blood in the veins, and to re-establish the equilibrium between it and the arterial blood. Either as a consequence of this treatment, or in the natural course of the illness, a terrible crisis took place in June, 1849, during which Balzac's sufferings were intense; and for twenty-five hours the doctor never left him. After this he was better for a time, and though his eyesight had become so weak that he was unable to read at night, he could walk, go upstairs, and lie flat in bed. In October he was seized with what he called Moldavian fever, a disease which came, he said, from the swamps of the Danube, and ravaged the Odessa district and the steppes; and again he became dangerously ill. In January, 1850, the fever was followed by a terrible cold in his lungs, and he was obliged to remain for ten days in bed. However, he was cheered by the society of Madame Hanska and Madame Georges Mniszech, who showed "adorable goodness" in keeping him company during his imprisonment.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 404.

After hearing all this, it is startling to read in a letter from Madame Honoré de Balzac to her daughter written from Frankfort on May 16th, 1850,* that it is awkward that she should know nothing of the regimen to which Balzac has been subjected by Dr. Knothe; because when they arrive in Paris, his own doctor is certain to ask for particulars! The most indifferent hostess could not fail, one would think, to interest herself sufficiently about the welfare of the solitary and

* Unpublished letter in the possession of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

patriated guest under her roof, to consult with e doctor about him when he was dangerously ill.
ore especially would she feel responsibility, when was owing to her own action that the patient cut off from all other advice, except that of a edical man who was her peculiar protégé. He uld thus be completely in her charge; and she uld naturally be nervously anxious, for her own nfort and satisfaction, to acquaint herself with e course of the malady, and with the treatment ed to subdue it. If we add to these considerans the fact that the sufferer was not a mere quaintance, was not even only a great friend;
t was the man who loved her, the man whose fe she had promised to become, Madame nska's ignorance appears totally inexplicable.
We must remember, however, that we only have lzac's account of his illness, and of his interviews
th the doctor; and that the malady being heart ease, it is possible that Dr. Knothe considered it duty to deceive his patient—possible therefore at Madame Hanska knew before her marriage at Balzac was a dying man, and that the ctor's prescriptions were useless.
Owing to the burning of her letters, we have ly Balzac's enthusiastic and lover-like descriptions guide our idea of Madame Hanska; and she mains to some extent a shadowy figure, difficult realise. Several characteristics, however, stand clearly: among them her power of hiding her oughts and feelings from those to whom she was most deeply attached; also an occasional self-control, which seems strangely at variance with her naturally passionate and uncontrolled nature. She was extremely proud; and the wish, while pleasing herself, to do nothing which would lower her in the eyes of the world, exercised a powerful influence over her actions. Intellectually brilliant, a clever woman of business, and mentally active; she was yet on some occasions curiously inert, and carried the state of mind embodied in the words "live and let live," to dangerous lengths. She must have possessed great determination, as even Balzac's adoration, and his undoubted powers of fascination, could not move her from the vacillations which, designedly or no, kept him enchained at her feet while she remained free.

Among much however, in her character that we cannot admire, she possessed one virtue in perfection—that of maternal love. The bond of affection between the mother and her daughter Anna was strong and enduring, and Madame Hanska would willingly have sacrificed everything for her beloved child's happiness. This was the true, engrossing love of her life; her affection for Balzac not having remained in its first freshness, as his love for her had done. On the contrary, it was at this time slightly withered, and had been partially stifled by prudential considerations, so that it was difficult to discover among the varied and tangled growths which surrounded it.

It is an interesting problem whether Balzac, spite of his brave words, realised that Madame Ianska no longer cared for him. When he wrote iat he was sure that none of these deferments roceeded from want of love, did he pen these rds with a wistful attempt to prove to himself iat the fact was as he stated? After eighteen onths in the same house with Madame Hanska, ould he really believe that only material difficules kept her apart from him? Or did he at last nderstand: and though stricken to death, cling

'll, for the sake of his pride and his lost illusions, what had been for so long his one object in fe? We do not know.

The only thing of which we are certain is, that the fact of Madame Hanska's indifference had owly and painfully dawned upon Balzac, he would ever have told, and would have used words to de his knowledge.

On the other hand, there is sometimes a ring of uth about his words, which seems to prove that e had not yet tasted the full bitterness of the agedy of his life. On November 29th, 1849, he rote to Madame Surville*: "It is the recompense f your life to possess two such children; you must ot be unjust to fate; you ought to be willing to ccept many misfortunes. The case is the same ith me and Madame Hanska. The gift of her ffection accounts to me for all my troubles, my orries, and my terrible labours. I have been aying in advance the price of this treasure: as

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 426.

Napoleon says, everything is paid for here, nothing is stolen. I seem, indeed, to have paid very little. Twenty-five years of work and struggle are nothing compared to a love so splendid, so radiant, so complete. I have been fourteen months in a desert, for it is a desert; and it seems to me that they have passed like a dream, without an hour's weariness, without a single dispute; and that after five years of travel together, and sixteen years of intimate acquaintance, our only troubles have been caused by the state of our health and by business matters."

When he wrote these words, Balzac must have at last felt tolerably confident about a happy solution to his troubles. However, in a later letter to his mother, he says that the Wierzchownia party are going to Kiev for the great Fair, that he will avail himself of this occasion for the renewal of his passport, and that he will not know till he arrives there, whether the great event will at last take place. In any case, he will start for France directly after the party return to Wierz chownia in the beginning of February; and as caution is still highly important, his mother must judge from his directions about the Rue Fortunée, whether he is coming back alone, or is bringing his bride with him. She is, in any case, not to be sparing about fires in the library and the picture gallery; and can write to him at Berlin, and at Frankfort, on his way home.

The great Fair at Kiev, which was called the Foire des Contrats," was a notable occasion for iety ; and extensive preparations were made be- rehand for the enjoyment of a thoroughly festive e. A house was hired by Madame Hanska id the Mniszechs, and furniture, carriages, and rvants, were despatched in advance. The weather, owever, was an important consideration ; and on is occasion, owing to the unusual inclemency of e season, the roads were unfortunately impassable, that the pleasure trip had to be deferred from e middle till the end of February. This was doubt a sad disappointment to the Countess nna, who thereby missed much enjoyment, and e delay must have caused intense irritation to the patient Balzac, but Madame Hanska's feelings the subject remain, as usual, enigmatical.

When the Wierzchownia party at last arrived Kiev, Madame Georges Mniszech found plenty gaiety awaiting her, and enjoyed herself im- ensely, going out to balls in costumes of regal agnificence. Her partners were often very ugh, and on one occasion Balzac relates that a andkerchief belonging to the young Countess, ich had cost more than 500 francs, was torn pieces in a figure of the mazurka, in which en contend for the dancer's handkerchief. How- ver, "La mère adorable" at once repaired the eficiency in her daughter's trousseau by presenting r with one of the best of her own, "twice as ne, with only linen enough to blow one's nose on, the rest being English point lace."

Balzac was unable to be present at any of these festivities, as the journey to Kiev had caused him acute suffering; and two days after his arrival, while he was paying his State visits to the authorities,* he caught the most violent cold he had ever had, and spent the time of his stay at Kiev in his bedroom, where his only pleasure was to see the Countess Anna before she started for her parties, and to admire her beautiful clothes. He ascribes his malady to "a terrible and deleterious blast of wind called the 'chasse-neige,' which travels by the course of the Dnieper, and perhaps comes from the shores of the Black Sea," and which managed to penetrate to him, though he was wrapped up with furs so that no spot seemed left for the outside air to reach. He was now very ill, and the slightest agitation, even a sentence spoken rather loudly in his presence, would bring on a terrible fit of suffocation. He still hoped to return to Paris before long, and clung to the idea that his wife would accompany him; but he said it would be impossible to travel without a servant, as he was unable to carry a parcel or to move quickly. As he remarks, "Tout cela n'est pas gai!"

However, his expedition and its attendant suffering were not useless,† as the "four or five successive illnesses and the sufferings from the climate, which I have laughed at for her sake, have touched that noble soul; so that she is, as

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 436.

† Ibid., vol. ii. p. 438.

sensible woman, more influenced by them, than raid of the few little debts which remain to be aid, and I see that everything will go well." On Iarch 11th, 1850, he writes from Berditchef that everything is now arranged for the affair his nother knows of," but that the greatest discretion still necessary. Madame de Balzac is given inute directions about the flowers which are to ecorate the house in the Rue Fortunée, as a rprise to Madame Honoré; and as we read, we n imagine Balzac's pride and delight when he rote the name. His ailments and sufferings are rgotten, and the letter sounds as though written y an enthusiastic boy. He will send from rankfort to let Madame de Balzac know the xact day that he and his bride will reach Paris;
nd in order that the mystery may be preserved, ill merely say, "Do not forget on such a day to ave the garden arranged," * and his mother will nderstand what he means. The whole house is vidently photographed in his mind like the houses his novels. He knows the exact position of ch vase: of the big jardinière in the first room, e one in the Japanese drawing-room, the two the domed boudoir, and the two tiny ones in e grey apartment. They are all to be filled th flowers; but the marquetry jardinière in the een drawing-room, evidently the future Madame onoré's special abode, is to be filled with "belles, lles fleurs!"

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 444.

The wedding took place at seven o'clock on the morning of March 14th, 1850, at the church of Saint Barbe at Berditchef. In the unavoidable absence of the Bishop of Jitomir, the ceremony was performed by the Abbé Comte Czarouski, whom Balzac calls a holy and virtuous priest, and likens to Abbé Hinaux, the Duchesse d'Angoulême's confessor.

The Countess Anna accompanied her mother, and was in the highest spirits; and the witnesses were the Comte Georges Mniszech, the Comte Gustave Olizar brother-in-law to the Abbé Comte Czarouski, and the curé of the parish of Berditchef. Madame Honoré de Balzac had given her capital to her children, but received in exchange a large income, a fact which she wisely concealed because of Balzac's creditors; and Balzac speaks with admiration of her noble generosity and disinterestedness, in thus denuding herself of her fortune.

The newly-married couple travelled back to Wierzchownia, arriving, quite tired out, at half-past ten at night; and next morning, as soon as he woke, Balzac wrote to inform his mother of the great event. He explained, with a well-justified prevision of future discord, if the elder Madame de Balzac's dignity were not sufficiently considered, that his wife had intended writing herself to offer her respects, but that her hands were so swollen with rheumatic gout that she could not hold a pen. He further informed his family, who had hitherto een kept in ignorance of the fact, that from the ame cause she was often unable to walk. How-ver, this did not depress him, as he remarked with is usual cheerfulness, that she would certainly e cured in Paris, where she would be able to take xercise and would follow a prescribed treatment. On the same day he penned a delighted letter to is sister, containing the exultant words: "For wenty-four hours, therefore, there has now existed Madame Eve de Balzac, née Rzewuska, or a Madame Honoré de Balzac, or a Madame de Balzac the younger." He could hardly believe in is own good fortune, and the joyful letter finishes vith the words, "Ton frère Honoré, au comble du onheur!"

Two days later, Balzac wrote to Madame Carraud letter in which he said: "Three days ago I arried the only woman I have ever loved, whom love more than ever, and whom I shall love ill death. This union is, I think, the recompense vhich God has had in reserve for me after so much dversity, so many years of work, so much gone hrough and overcome. I did not have a happy outh or happy springtide; I shall have the most rilliant of summers and the sweetest of autumns." n his newly-found happiness he did not forget that is old friend was now in straitened circumstances, ut begged her from himself and Madame Honoré o consider their house as her own: "Therefore, vhenever you wish to come to Paris you will come o us, without even giving us notice. You will come to us in the Rue Fortunée as if to your own home, just as I used to go to Frapesle. This is my right. I must remind you of what you said to me one day at Angoulême, when, having broken down after writing 'Louis Lambert,' I was afraid of madness, and talked of the way in which people afflicted in this manner were neglected. On that occasion you said, 'If you were to become mad I should take care of you!' I have never forgotten those words, or your look and expression. I am just the same now as I was in July, 1832. It is because of those words that I claim you to-day, for I am nearly mad with happiness."*

In another part of his letter he tells her: "Ah! I never forget your maternal love, your divine sympathy with suffering. Therefore, thinking of all you are worth, and of the way in which you are struggling with trouble, I, who have so often waged war with that rough adversary, tell you that, knowing your unhappiness, I am ashamed of my happiness; but we are both too great for these littlenesses. We can say to each other that happiness and unhappiness are only conditions in which great hearts live intensely, that as much strength of mind is required in one position as in the other, and that misfortune with true friends is perhaps more endurable than happiness surrounded by envy."

Balzac was not, after all, destined to start on his journey homeward as quickly as he had intended. His health was terribly bad, his eyes ad become so weak that he could neither read nor write, and the chronic heart and lung malady was gaining ground so rapidly, that his breathing was affected if he made the slightest movement. It was absolutely necessary that he should rest for a time at Wierzchownia before attempting any further exertion. Another delay was caused by the young Countess being attacked by measles. Her devoted mother, who in her crippled state could not attempt any active nursing, sat by her daughter's bedside all day, and refused to leave Wierzchownia till her anxiety about her darling's health should be over.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 448.

It was, therefore, not till the end of April that M. and Madame Honoré de Balzac started for what proved to be a terrible journey. They did not arrive in Dresden till about May 10th, having taken three weeks to go a distance which ought naturally to have been accomplished in five or six days. The roads were in a fearful condition, and their lives were in danger not once, but a hundred times in the day. Sometimes fifteen or sixteen men were required to hoist the carriage out of the mud-holes into which it had fallen. It is a wonder that Balzac survived the torture of the journey, and it must have been very trying to the rheumatic Madame Honoré. When at last they arrived at Dresden they were both utterly exhausted, while Balzac was extremely ill, and felt ten years older than when he started. His sight was so bad that he could not see the letters that he was tracing on the paper, and was obliged to apologise to his correspondents for his extraordinary hieroglyphics, while he told Madame Surville that the swollen condition of his wife's hands still rendered it impossible for her to write.

However, Madame Honoré was well enough to amuse herself by visits to the jewellers' shops, where she bought a magnificent pearl necklace, a purchase of which Balzac evidently approved, as he remarked that it was so beautiful that it would make a saint mad! On his part, he was greeted on his arrival by a new vexation; as letters from Paris told him of "Vautrin" being put on the stage without his permission, and, as we have seen, he wrote with much indignation, to put a stop to this infringement of his rights.

An interesting letter already referred to, which is now in the possession of the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, is dated from Frankfort, the travellers' next stopping-place. It is written to the Countess Anna, and was begun by Balzac, and finished by his wife. About Balzac's part of the letter there is not much to remark, except that he was evidently very fond of his step-daughter, that he told her how ill he was, and that the handwriting is the scrawl of a man who could not see. His high spirits indeed have disappeared, but this change of tone is easily accounted for by the state of his health. It is Madame Honoré's part of the letter which strikes the reader as curiously inadequate. It is dated May 16th, only five days ter Balzac's letter from Dresden informing his mily of his wife's inability to hold a pen, and is erfectly written ; so that her rheumatic gout must ave abated suddenly. She begins her letter by ommenting placidly on the sadness of seeing the ufferings of our "poor dear friend," says she tries vain to cheer him, and contrasts regretfully the fference between her feelings during this journey, nd her happiness when she last visited the same aces, with her darling child at her side. The incipal subject in her letter however, and the ne bright spot in her present rather wearying life, the wonderful pearl necklace, which she takes ut of its case conscientiously every day, that the r may preserve the whiteness of the pearls. She ates, indeed, that she does not care much about , and has only bought it to please her husband ; ut it seems to have pressed the unfortunate usband rather into the background, and to have ecome the chief centre of its owner's thoughts and licitude.

The chilling unsatisfactory impression the letter aves on the reader, however, is not conveyed so uch by what is said by Balzac's newly-married ife, as by what she leaves unsaid. It must be emembered that the Countess Eve possessed ne power of expressing herself with the utmost armth, and with even exaggerated emphasis, hen she saw fit occasion for a display of feeling. Ve must also keep the fact in mind, that in riting to the daughter who was her intimate friend, she would naturally give some indications of her real self; and though it might be impossible for one of her curiously secretive temperament to lift the veil altogether, and to open her heart without reserve, she would be likely in some way to enable the reader to realise her mental attitude. Therefore it is disconcerting and disquieting to discover that the one noticeable characteristic of the letter, is utter want of feeling. No anxiety is expressed about the growing illness of the sick man, not a word tells of fears so terrible that she hardly dares breathe them, about the ultimate result of his malady; on the contrary, everything is taken as a matter of course, and as though the writer had expected it beforehand. There is not even a recognition of Balzac as her husband; he is merely "our poor dear friend," a person for whom she feels vague pity, and in whom Anna's degree of interest is likely to be the same as her own.

Balzac was only married for about five months, and very little is known of his life during that time. It is certain, however, that his marriage did not bring him the happiness which he had expected, and Madame Hanska's letter from Frankfort helps to explain the reason of the tragedy. Perhaps he had raised his hopes too high for fulfilment to be a possibility in this world of compromise, and very likely his sufferings had made him irritable and exacting. Nevertheless, so quick a wearing out of the faithful and passionate love which had lasted for sixteen years, and so dden a killing of the joy which had permeated e man's whole being when he had at last ttained his goal, seems a hard task for a woman o accomplish; and can only be explained by her mployment of the formless yet resistless force of re indifference.

Balzac's awakening, the knowledge that the bsolute perfection he had dreamed of was only n ideal created by his own fancy, must have een inexpressibly bitter. Utter moral collapse nd vertigo were his portion, and chaos thundered n his ears, during his sudden descent from the eights clothed with brilliant sunshine, to the uzzling depths, where he groped in darkness and ought in vain for firm footing. "Our poor dear riend" seems, for the moment, to have merited ven more sympathy than the measure accorded o him by his wife, in her intervals of leisure after aring for her pearl necklace.

Balzac's mother had, as we have already seen, aken up her abode with Madame Surville, long efore the often-deferred appearance in Paris of er son and daughter-in-law; but Honoré had iven directions, that at any rate she was to leave he Rue Fortunée before he and his bride arrived. t would, he said, compromise her dignity to help vith the unpacking, and Madame Honoré should isit her mother-in-law next day to pay her respects. Balzac was anxious that the first meeting should ake place at Laure's house rather than at Madame le Balzac's lodging at Suresnes, as it was now impossible for him to mount any steps, and there were fewer stairs at No. 47, Rue des Martyrs than at his mother's abode.* His health, he wrote, was so deplorable that he would not remain for long in Paris, but would go with his wife to Biarritz to take the waters.

The travellers did not after all arrive in Paris till near the end of May. This is proved by a letter from Madame de Balzac† to a friend, written on the 20th of that month, in which she says that they are now expected every day, but that their progress is a slow one, owing to her son's illness and the heavy condition of the roads. She adds that she has now been in bed for three months, so Laure must evidently have acted as her deputy, in the task of superintending François' preparations in the Rue Fortunée. No doubt François worked strenuously, as he, like all Balzac's servants, was devoted to his master, though on this occasion he unwittingly provided him with a ghastly home-coming.

The travellers did not arrive at the Rue Fortunée till late at night.‡ The house was brilliantly lit, and through the windows they could see the flowers with which the rooms were decorated; but in vain they rang at the courtyard gate—no one appeared to let them in. It was miserable arrival, and utterly inexplicable, as alzac had planned the arrangements most care-ılly beforehand, going minutely into commissariat etails, that his bride might find everything abso-ıtely comfortable on her arrival in her new home. t was impossible to force an entrance, so M. and Iadame Honoré de Balzac, utterly worn out by e fatigues of the journey, and longing for rest, ere obliged to sit in the carriage and spend ıe time in agitation and vain conjecture, while a ıessenger was despatched for a locksmith. When ıe door was at last opened, a terrible solution to ıe problem presented itself. The excitement and rain of the preparations, and of the hourly ex-ectation of the travellers, had completely upset ıe mental balance of the unfortunate François, ıd he had gone suddenly mad! It was a sinister men, a wretched commencement to Balzac's home e; and he, always superstitious, was no doubt ubly so in his invalided and suffering condition. rançois Munch was sent to a lunatic asylum, here he was cared for at his master's expense.

* "Correspondance," vol. ii. p. 456.

† "Une Page perdue de Honoré de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

‡ "Un Roman d'Amour," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

CHAPTER XVII

1850 AND AFTER

Balzac's ill-health—Théophile Gautier and Victor Hugo—Balzac's grief about the unfinished "Comédie Humaine"—His interview with the doctor—Victor Hugo's account of his death-bed—Balzac's death and funeral—Life afterwards in the Rue Fortunée—Reckless extravagance—House rifled at Madame de Balzac's death—Fate of Balzac's MSS.—His merits as a writer.

WHEN Balzac's friends came to visit him in the Rue Fortunée, they were much shocked by the change in his appearance. His breathing was short, his speech jerky, and his sight so bad that he was unable to distinguish objects clearly. Nevertheless, as Gautier says,* every one felt such intense confidence in his wonderful constitution that it seemed impossible to think of a probably fatal result to his malady. Balzac himself, optimistic as ever, clung persistently to his hope of speedy recovery. His fame was now at its zenith, the series entitled "Les Parents Pauvres" had awakened the utmost enthusiasm; and the élite of the Parisian world were eager to flock to the Rue Fortunée to stare at the curiosities collected there, and to make the equaintance of Balzac's rich and distinguished ussian wife.

* "Portraits Contemporains: Honoré de Balzac," by Théophile Gautier.

However, in his native country, Balzac was estined never to receive a full guerdon of adula- on and admiration; for though he was visited y a few friends, the doctors insisted on keeping m otherwise in the strictest retirement.

Théophile Gautier relates that he went to the ue Fortunée to say good-bye to his friend before rting for Italy, and, though disappointed not see him, was relieved about his health when ld that he was out driving. However, a little ter, a letter was brought to Gautier which had een dictated by Balzac to his wife, in which he xplained that he had only gone to the Custom- ouse to get out some luggage, and had done this gainst the express orders of his doctors. How- ver, he spoke cheerfully of his health, saying that e was feeling better, and that the next day the octors intended to attack the chronic malady from hich he was suffering. For two months at least e expected to be kept like a mummy, and not be allowed to speak or to move; but there ere great hopes of his ultimate recovery. If autier came again, he hoped for a letter before- and naming the day and hour, that he might rtainly be at home; as in the solitude to which e was doomed by the doctors, his friend's affection emed to him more precious than ever. All is was written in Madame de Balzac's hand- riting, and under it Balzac had scrawled: "I can neither read nor write!"* Gautier left for Italy soon after this, and he never saw his friend again. He read the news of Balzac's death in a newspaper when he was at Venice, taking an ice at the Café Florian, in the Piazza of St. Mark; and so terrible was the shock, that he nearly fell from his seat. He tells us that he felt for the moment unchristian indignation and revolt, when he thought of the octogenarian idiots he had seen that morning at the asylum on the island of San Servolo, and then of Balzac cut off in his prime; but he checked himself, for he remembered that all souls are equal in the sight of God.

Victor Hugo also visited the invalid, and says that even a month before his death he was perfectly confident about his recovery, and was gay and full of laughter, discussing politics, stating his own legitimist views with decision, and accusing his visitor of being a demagogue. He said: "I have M. de Beaujon's house without the garden, but I am owner of the gallery leading to the little church at the corner of the street. A door on my staircase leads into the church. One turn of the key, and I am at Mass. I care more for the gallery than for the garden."†

When Victor Hugo got up to go, Balzac accompanied him with difficulty to this staircase, to point out the precious door; and called to his wife,

* "Portraits Contemporains: Honoré de Balzac," by Théophile Gautier.

† "Choses Vues," by Victor Hugo.

Mind you show Hugo all my pictures." Though alzac does not appear to have been very intimate th the great romantic poet in former years, he ems to have found special pleasure in his society this time. Hugo was at the seaside when alzac next sent for him. He hurried back,* owever, at the urgent summons, and found the ving man stretched on a sofa covered with red id gold brocade. Balzac tried to rise, but could ot; his face was purple, and his eyes alone had fe in them. Now that happiness in his married fe had failed him, his mind had reverted to the et unfinished "Comédie Humaine"; and he talked ng and sadly of projected herculean labours, id of the fate of his still unpublished works. Although my wife has more brains than I, who ill support her in her solitude, she whom I ave accustomed to so much love?" "Certainly," ictor Hugo remarks drily, "she was crying a reat deal."

Nevertheless, though Balzac did at last realise is dangerous state, he had no idea that his end as approaching so near, and he still hoped to be ble to add a few more stones to the edifice of the Comédie Humaine," that great work, which was ow again the principal object of his life, the one right vision in a world of disappointment. In August, however, an agonising suspicion began for the first time to visit him momentarily, a terrible fear to assail him. What if there were not time after all? What if the creations which floated through his mind while he lay suffering and helpless, were never destined to be put into shape? What if his opportunity for work on earth were really over? It was a horrible idea; a fancy, he told himself, born only of weakness. Destiny must intend him to finish his appointed task. Robbed of everything else he had longed for, that one consolation surely remained. He would ask the doctor, would be content with no vague and soothing generalities, but would insist on knowing the exact truth. It could not—ah, it could not be as black as the nightmares of his imagination!

* See letter written by Madame Hamelin to the Countess Kisselef noted in "Histoire des Œuvres de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, p. 406.

He approached the subject cautiously on the doctor's next visit.* Perhaps, he said, he had after all never realised sufficiently the acuteness of his malady. He certainly felt terribly ill, and knew that he was losing ground; while, in spite of all his efforts, he was unable to eat anything. His duty required that he should bequeath a certain legacy to the public, and he had calculated carefully, and had discovered that he would be able in six months to accomplish his task. Could the doctor promise him that length of time? There was no answer to this searching question, but a hake of the head from the pitying doctor. "Ah," ried Balzac sorrowfully, "I see quite well that ou will not allow me six months. . . . Well, at ny rate, you will at least give me six weeks? . . Six weeks with fever is an eternity. Hours re like days . . . and then the nights are not ost." Again the doctor shook his head, and Balzac once more lowered his claims for a vestige f life. "I have courage to submit," he said roudly; "but six days . . . you will certainly ive me that? I shall then be able to write own hasty plans that my friends may be able to nish, shall tear up bad pages and improve good nes, and shall glance rapidly through the fifty olumes I have already written. Human will an do miracles." Balzac pleaded pathetically, most as though he thought his interlocutor ould grant the boon of longer life if he willed o do so. He had aged ten years since the eginning of the interview, and he had now no oice left to speak, and the doctor hardly any oice for answering. The latter managed, how-ver, to tell his patient that everything must be one to-day, because in all probability to-morrow ould not exist for him; and Balzac cried with orror, "I have then only six hours!" fell back n his pillows, and spoke no more.

* The following account of Balzac's interview with his doctor is taken from an article written by Arsène Houssaye in the Figaro of August 20th, 1883. It is right to add that the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, the great authority on Balzac, throws grave doubts on the accuracy of the story.

He died the next day, and Victor Hugo gives s one more glimpse of him.* The poet was told y his wife, who had visited Madame de Balzac during the day, that Balzac's last hour had come; and directly after dinner he took a cab and drove rapidly to the Rue Fortunée. "I rang. It was moonlight, occasionally veiled by clouds. The street was deserted. No one came. I rang a second time. The door was opened. A servant appeared with a candle. 'What does Monsieur want?' she said. She was crying.

* "Choses Vues, 1850: Mort de Balzac," by Victor Hugo.

"I gave my name. I was shown into the room on the ground floor. On a pedestal opposite the fireplace was the colossal bust of Balzac by David. In the middle of the salon, on a handsome oval table, which had for legs six gilded statuettes of great beauty, a wax candle was burning. Another woman came in crying, and said: 'He is dying. Madame has gone to her own rooms. The doctors gave him up yesterday.' After going into medical details, the woman continued: 'The night was bad. This morning at nine o'clock Monsieur spoke no more. Madame sent for a priest. The priest came, and administered extreme unction. Monsieur made a sign to show that he understood. An hour afterwards he pressed the hand of his sister, Madame Surville. Since eleven o'clock the death rattle has been in his throat, and he can see nothing. He will not last out the night. If you wish it, Monsieur, I will call M. Surville, who has not yet gone to bed.'

"The woman left me. I waited several minutes. The candle hardly lighted up the splendid furniture of the salon, and the magnificent paintings by Porbus and Holbein which were hanging on the walls. The marble bust showed faintly in the obscurity, like the spectre of the dying man. A corpse-like odour filled the house.

"M. Surville came in, and confirmed all that the servant had told me. I asked to see M. de Balzac.

"We crossed a corridor, went up a staircase covered with a red carpet and crowded with artistic objects—vases, statues, pictures, and stands with enamels on them. Then we came to another passage, and I saw an open door. I heard the sound of difficult, rattling breathing. I entered Balzac's room.

"The bedstead was in the centre of the room. It as of mahogany, and across the foot and at the head were beams provided with straps for moving the sick man. M. de Balzac was in this bed, his head resting on a heap of pillows, to which the ed damask sofa cushions had been added. His face was purple, almost black, and was inclined o the right. He was unshaved, his grey hair was cut short, and his eyes open and fixed. I aw his profile, and it was like that of the Emperor Napoleon.

"An old woman, the nurse, and a servant, stood beside the bed. A candle was burning on a table ehind the head of the bed, another on a chest of drawers near the door. A silver vase was on the stand near the bed. The women and man were silent with a kind of terror, as they listened to the rattling breathing of the dying man.

"The candle at the head of the bed lit up brilliantly the portrait of a young man, fresh-coloured and smiling, which was hanging near the fireplace. . . .

"I lifted the coverlet and took Balzac's hand. It was covered with perspiration. I pressed it. He did not respond to the pressure. . . . .

"I went downstairs again, carrying in my mind the memory of that livid face, and, crossing the drawing-room, I looked again at the bust—immovable, impassive, proud, and smiling faintly, and I compared death with immortality."

Balzac died that night, Sunday, August 17th, 1850, at half-past eleven, at the age of fifty-one.

The dying man's almost complete isolation is strange, and the servant's news that M. Surville had not yet gone to bed has a callous ring about it. Perhaps, however, the doctors had told Madame de Balzac and Madame Surville that Balzac was unconscious, and they had therefore withdrawn, utterly exhausted by the fatigues of the night before. In any case, it seems sad, though possibly of no moment to the dying man, that several of his nearest relations should have deserted him before the breath had left his body. Our respect for the elder Madame de Balzac is decidedly raised, because, though there had occasionally been disagreements between her and her son, the true mother feeling asserted itself at the last, and she alone watched with the paid attendants till the end came.

However, some one was busy about the arrangements, as Balzac's portrait was taken by Giraud directly after his death, and a cast was made of his beautifully-shaped hand. His body was taken into the Beaujon Chapel before burial, so that he passed for the last time, as Victor Hugo remarks, through that door, the key of which was more precious to him than all the beautiful gardens which had belonged to the old Farmer-General.

The funeral service was held on Wednesday, August 20th, at the Church of Sainte Philippe du Roule. The rain was descending in torrents, but the procession, followed by a large crowd, walked the whole way across Paris to the Cemetery of Père-la-Chaise, where the interment took place. The pall-bearers were Victor Hugo, Alexandre Dumas, Monsieur Baroche, and Sainte-Beuve. At the grave Victor Hugo spoke, finishing with the words: "No, it is not the Unknown to him. I have said this before, and I shall never tire of repeating it: it is not darkness to him, it is Light! It is not the end, but the beginning; not nothingness, but eternity! Is not this the truth, I ask you who listen to me? Such coffins proclaim immortality. In the presence of certain illustrious dead, we understand the divine destiny of that intellect which has traversed earth to suffer and to be purified. Do we not say to ourselves here, to-day, that it is impossible for a great genius in this life to be other than a great spirit after death?"*

The Cemetery of Père-la-Chaise had been one of Balzac's favourite haunts in the old half-starved days of the Rue Lesdiguières. "Here I am back from Père-la-Chaise," he wrote to his sister in 1820,† "and I have brought with me some good big inspiring reflections. Decidedly, the only fine epitaphs are these: La Fontaine, Masséna, Molière, a single name, which tells all and makes one dream." Probably Madame Surville remembered these words and repeated them to Madame Honoré de Balzac, for the monument erected to Balzac is a broken column with his name inscribed on it.

The fortunes of the inhabitants of the Rue Fortunée were not happy after Balzac's death. Madame Honoré de Balzac's contemporaries considered that she was not really as overwhelmed with sorrow at her husband's death as she appeared to be, and that when she wrote heartbroken letters, she slightly exaggerated the real state of her feelings; but she assumed gallantly the burdens laid upon her by the state of pecuniary embarrassment in which her husband died. If Balzac had lived longer and had been able to work steadily, there is little doubt that he would in a few years have become a free man, as the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul tells us‡ that in the ears between 1841 and 1847, after which date his roductions became very rare, he had enormously iminished the sum he owed.

* "Funérailles de Balzac," in "Actes et Paroles," by Victor Hugo.

† "Correspondance," vol. i. p. 24.

‡ "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," by the Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul.

Under Balzac's will his widow might have efused to acknowledge any liability for his debts, ut she set to work bravely, with the aid of MM. Dutacq and Fessart, to make as much noney as she could out of Balzac's published vorks, and to bring before the public those that vere still unpublished. In this way "Mercadet e Faiseur" was acted a year after Balzac's death, nd "Les Petits Bourgeois" and "Le Député l'Arcis" were published, the latter being finished, ccording to Balzac's wish, by Charles Rabou. Les Paysans," which was to have filled eight olumes, and of which, as we have already seen, nly a few chapters were written, presented great ifficulty; but at last Madame de Balzac, aided y Champfleury and by Charles Rabou, managed o give some consistency to the fragment, and it ppeared in the Revue de Paris in April, May, and une, 1855. Unfortunately, however, no informa- ion was given as to the unfinished state in which t had been left by Balzac, and therefore no explanation was offered of the insufficiency of the dénouement, and the inadequacy of the last hapters. Madame de Balzac worked hard, and ong before her death in April, 1882, the whole f Balzac's debts were paid off.

This was most creditable to her; but side by ide with her admirable conduct in this respect, she seems to have either actively abetted, or at any rate acquiesced in mad extravagance on the part of Madame Georges Mniszech, who, with her husband, had come to live in the Rue Fortunée after Balzac's death. Perhaps Madame de Balzac was too busy with her literary and business arrangements, to pay attention to what was happening, or possibly maternal devotion prevented her from denying her beloved daughter anything she craved for. At all events the results of her supineness were lamentable, especially as M. Georges Mniszech was not capable of exercising any restraint on his wife; he being for some years before his death in 1881, in the most delicate state of health, both mental and physical.

Madame Georges Mniszech—after years of the wild Russian steppes, suddenly plunged into the fascinations of shopping in Paris, and left to her own devices—seems to have shown senseless folly in her expenditure. Additions were made to the house in the Rue Fortunée, though Balzac's rooms were left untouched; and the Château de Beauregard, at Villeneuve-Saint-Georges, was bought as a country residence. Madame de Balzac and her daughter were, however, rich, and could quite afford to live comfortably, and even luxuriously. Their ruin seems to have been brought about by reckless expenditure on things which were of absolutely no use, and were only bought for the amusement of buying. Several sales of pictures ook place, and on February 9th, 1882,* the Château de Beauregard and its contents were sold by order of the President of the Civil Tribunal of Corbeil.

Madame de Balzac died in April of the same year; and the very day of her funeral, Madame Georges Mniszech's creditors pushed her and her maid into the street, and rifled the house in the Rue Fortunée. The booty was transported to the auction-room known as l'Hôtel Drouot, and there a sale was held by order of justice of Balzac's library, his Buhl cabinets, and some of his MSS., including that of "Eugénie Grandet," which had been given to Madame Hanska on December 24th, 1833. During the shameless pillage of the house, the vultures who ransacked it found evidence of the most reckless, the most imbecile extravagance, proof positive that the wisdom, prudence, even the principles of poor Balzac's paragon the Countess Anna, had been routed by the glitter and glamour of the holiday city. One room was filled with boxes containing hats, and in another, piles of costly silks were heaped, untouched since their arrival from the fashionable haberdasher or silk mercer.† Balzac's treasures, the curiosities he had amassed with so much trouble, the pictures of which he had been so proud, were ruthlessly seized; while precious manuscripts and letters, which would perhaps have brought in a hundred thousand francs if they had been put up for sale, were thrown out of the window by the exasperated throng.

* "Life of Balzac," by Frederick Wedmore.

† "Journal des Goncourts," vol. viii. p. 43

The Vicomte de Spoelberch de Lovenjoul rescued a page of the first of Balzac's letters to Madame Hanska which has been found up to this time, from a cobbler whose stall was opposite the house. The cobbler, when once started on the quest by the Vicomte, discovered many other letters, sketches, and unfinished novels, which had been picked up by the neighbouring shopkeepers, and were only saved in the nick of time from being used to wrap up pounds of butter, or to make bags for other household commodities. It was an exciting chase, requiring patience and ingenuity; and Balzac's former cook held out for years, before she would consent to sell a packet of letters which the Vicomte coveted specially. Sometimes incidentally there were delightful surprises, and occasionally real joys; as on the occasion when the searcher found at a distant grocer's shop, the middle of the letter, of which the first page had been saved from destruction at the hands of the cobbler.

The bitter dislike Balzac had evoked in the literary world, and his occasional obscurity and clumsy style, have militated very strongly against his popularity in his native land, where perfection in the manipulation of words is of supreme importance in a writer. While in France, however, Balzac's undoubted faults have partially blinded his countrymen to his consummate merits as a writer, and they have been strangely slow in acknowledging the debt of gratitude they owe to him, the rest of the world has already begun to realise his power of creating type, his wonderful imagination, his versatility, and his extraordinary impartiality; and to accord him his rightful place among the Immortals. Nevertheless we are still too near to him, to be able to focus him clearly, and to estimate aright his peculiar place in literature, or the full scope of his genius.

Some very great authorities claim him as a ember of the Romantic School; while, on the other hand, he is often looked on—apparently with more reason—as the first of the Realists. His object in writing was, he tells us, to represent nankind as he saw it, to be the historian of the nineteenth century, and to classify human beings as Buffon had classified animals. No doubt his scheme was very imperfectly carried out: certainly the powerful mind of Balzac with its wealth of imagination, often projected itself into his puppets, so that many of his characters are not the ordinary men and women he wished to portray, but are inspired by the fire of genius. This fact does not, however, alter the aim of their creator. He intended to be merely a chronicler, a scientific observer of things around him; and though his works are tinged to a large extent with the Romanticism of the powerful school in vogue in his day, this object marks him plainly as the forerunner of the Realists, the founder of a totally new conception of the scope and range of the novel.

Théophile Gautier's words should prove to the modern reader, the debt of gratitude he owes to the inaugurator of a completely original system of fiction. Speaking of Balzac's impecunious and ambitious heroes, Gautier cries:* "O Corinne, who on the Cape of Messina allowest thy snowy arm to hang over the ivory lyre, while the son of Albion, clothed in a superb new cloak, and with elegant boots perfectly polished, gazes at thee, and listens in an elegant pose: Corinne, what wouldst thou have said to such heroes? They have nevertheless one little quality which Oswald lacked—they live, and with so strong a life that we have met them a thousand times." Balzac's own words, speaking of his play "La Marâtre,"† might also serve for a motto for his novels: "I dream of a drawing-room comedy, where everything is calm, quiet, and amiable. The men play whist placidly by the light of candles with little green shades. The women talk and laugh while they work at their embroidery. They all take tea together. To sum up, everything announces good order and harmony. Well, underneath are agitating passions; the drama stirs, it prepares itself secretly, till it blazes forth like the flame of a conflagration."

* "Portraits Contemporains: Honoré de Balzac," by Théophile Gautier.

† "Historiettes et Souvenirs d'un Homme de Théâtre," by H. Hostein.

Balzac is essentially a Realist, in his use of the novel as a vehicle for the description of real struggling life; with money and position, the principal desiderata of modern civilisation, powerful as determining factors in the moulding of men's actions. Life, as portrayed in the old-fashioned novel, where the hero and heroine and their love affairs were the sole focus of attraction, and the other characters were grouped round in subordinate positions, while every one declined in interest as he advanced in years, was not life as Balzac saw it; and he pictures his hero's agony at not having a penny with which to pay his cab fare, with as much graphic intensity, as he tells of the same young gentleman's despair when his inamorata is indifferent to him.

Nevertheless, if we compare Balzac with the depressing writers of the so-called Realist School, we shall find that his conception of life differed greatly from theirs. In Flaubert's melancholy books, even perfection of style and painstaking truth of detail do not dissipate the deadly dulness of an unreal world, where no one rises above the low level of self-gratification; while Zola considers man so completely in his physical aspect, that he ends by degrading him below the animal world. Balzac, on the other hand, believed in purity, in devotion, and unselfishness; though he did not think that these qualities are triumphant on earth. In his pessimistic view of life, virtue generally suffered, and had no power against vice; but he knew that it existed, and he believed in a future where wrongs would be righted.

He is a poet and idealist, and thus akin to the Romanticists—though he lacks their perfection of diction—in his feeling for the beauty of atmospheric effects, and also in his enthusiasm for music, which he loved passionately. The description of Montriveau's emotions when the cloistered Duchesse de Langeais plays in the church in Spain—and Balzac tells us that the sound of the organ bears the mind through a thousand scenes of life to the infinite which parts earth from heaven, and that through its tones the luminous attributes of God Himself pierce and radiate—is totally unrealistic both in moral tone, and in its accentuation of the power of the higher emotions. His intense admiration for Sir Walter Scott—an admiration which he expresses time after time in his letters—is a further proof of his sympathy for the school of thought, which glorified the picturesque Middle Ages above every other period of history.

Whichever school, however, may claim Balzac, it is an undisputed fact that he possessed in a high degree that greatest of all attributes—the power of creation of type. Le Père Goriot, Balthazar Claes, Old Grandet, La Cousine Bette, Le Cousin Pons, and many other people in Balzac's pages, are creations; they live and are immortal. He has endowed them with more splendid and superabundant vitality than is accorded to ordinary humanity.

To do this, something is required beyond keenness of vision. The gift of seeing vividly—as under a dazzling light—to the very kernel of the object stripped of supernumerary circumstance, is indeed necessary for the portrayal of character; but although Dickens, as well as Balzac, possessed this faculty to a high degree, his people are often qualities personified, or impossible monsters. For the successful creation of type, that power in which Balzac is akin to Shakespeare, it is necessary that a coherent whole shall be formed, and that the full scope of a character shall be realised, with its infinite possibilities on its own plane, and its impotence to move a hairsbreadth on to another. The mysterious law which governs the conduct of life must be fathomed; so that, though there may be unexpected and surprising developments, the artistic sense and intuition which we possess shall not be outraged, and we shall still recognise the abiding personality under everything. Balzac excels in this; and because of this power, and also because—at a time when Byronic literature was in the ascendant, and it was the fashion to think that the quintessence of beauty could be found by diving into the depths of one's own being—he came forward without pose or self-consciousness, as a simple observer of the human race, the world will never cease to owe him a debt of gratitude, and to rank him among her greatest novelists.

INDEX

Abrantès, Duchesse d', 6, 74; her friendship with Balzac, 102; her poverty, 103; her memoirs, 103; death, 104
Abrantès, Napoléon d', 104
Académie Française, elections to the, 274, 330
Aix, 151
Ajaccio, 234
Andrieux, M., his opinion on the play "Cromwell," 72
Angers, David d', his bust of Balzac, 258, 372
Angoulême, 94
Angoulême, Duchesse d', 44
Annecy, 154
Antwerp, 284
"Argow the Pirate," 79
Artois, Comte d', 81
Assonvillez, M. d', 84
"Auberge Rouge, L'," 118
Auger, Hippolyte, 114
Avignon, 284
Avray, Ville d', 12, 32, 237

Bachelin, M., "Balzac à Neufchâtel," 161 note
Baden-Baden, 284
Balssa, Bernard François, 111
Balzac, Henri de, 21, 221; his character, 29; return from abroad, 174
Balzac, Honoré de, 1; his letters to Madame Hanska, 3, 5, 14; travels, 4; versatility, 4, 8, 78, 189, 256, 300, 381; character, 6–9, 36, 46, 60, 187, 199; absorption in his work, 9, 68, 113; reserve, 10, 64; vanity, 12; absence of self-consciousness, 13; "Lettres à l'Étrangère," 14, 157; his appearance, 16, 18, 180; eyes, 17, 182; personality, 17; intuition, 18; dress, 18; fits of depression, 20; imaginary characters, 22; unpractical schemes, 23, 57, 64, 116, 190, 230, 241, 254, 314, 318; his father, 24; birth, 26; his mother, 27; her severity towards him, 30; his affection for his sister, 30, 34, 344; fear of his mother, 35; affection for his grandparents, 35; his life at school, 36–41; "Louis Lambert," 37, 50; love for the scenery of Touraine, 42; his tutors, 44; lessons in rhetoric, 45; admiration for Napoleon, 46; attends lectures at the Sorbonne, 47; his legal studies, 48; "Un Épisode sous la Terreur," 48; Une "Ténébreuse Affaire," 49; "César Birotteau," 49, 233; his failure in society, 50, 101; "Peau de Chagrin," 50, 62, 66, 118, 122–5; dislike of the legal profession, 53; trial of his literary powers, 54; established in the Rue Lesdiguières, 54; hardships and privations, 55–7, 73, 91, 317; early development of his character, 58; Royalist principles, 59, 82; his play "Cromwell," 59, 67, 70; ambitions, 59, 188; constancy, 59; simplicity, 60; recreations, 62, 106, 177–9; conversational powers, 63; belief in magnetism, 65, 185; obliged to live at home, 73; discomforts, 74, 79; his novels, 74–79, 255, 276; pseudonyms, 76;

political essays, 78, 192; friendship with Madame de Berny, 79, 93, 106, 134; his estimate of her, 84; publisher and printer, 84–8; failure of the business, 88; impending bankruptcy, 88; his novel "Les Chouans," 90, 100, 107; pecuniary difficulties, 90, 117, 126, 168, 173, 175, 190, 203, 231, 292, 317, 324, 329; death of his father, 92; temptation to commit suicide, 93; friendship with Madame Carraud, 94; Auguste Borget, 96; M. Dablin, 97; M. de Margonne, 98; La Touche, 98; Duchesse d'Abrantès, 102–4; George Sand, 104–6; his novel "Béatrix," 105; "Physiologie du Mariage," 107; his right to the prefix "de," 107; lawsuit with the Revue de Paris, 108, 116, 121, 212; his family name, 111; passion for work, 112, 128, 172, 224; mode of writing, 113, 128, 256; his letters on Paris, 115; love of Nature, 117; disputes with Pichot, 118–21; "L'Auberge Rouge," 118; "Le Maître Cornélius," 118; withdraws from the Revue de Paris, 121, 206; "Scènes de la Vie Privée," 122; his kindness to Jules Sandeau, 125; extravagance, 126; number of his publications, 127, 168; mode of living, 127; method of composition, 128–33; unknown correspondents, 135; relations with the Marquise de Castries, 137, 151–3; letters from Madame Hanska, 139, 156; farewell to Madame de Berny, 146; directions to his mother, 148, 299, 352, 355, 363; projected marriage, 149; relations with women, 150, 158, 218; at Aix, 151; rupture with the Marquise de Castries, 153; mental sufferings, 158, 289; relations with Madame Hanska, 159, 165, 170, 279–82, 292, 332, 339, 346; his first meeting with her, 162; "Études de Mœurs au XIXième Siècle," 166; "Comédie Humaine," 167, 265–8; "Le Médecin de Campagne," 169; "Eugénie Grandet," 169; at Geneva, 170; "Duchesse de Langeais," 170; symptoms of illness, 172; "La Recherche de l'Absolu," 172; "Le Père Goriot," 172; cost of his journey to Vienna, 173; republishes his early novels, 174; debts, 175, 204, 254, 259; his portrait, 180–87; belief in somnambulism, 185; personal charm, 188; capacity for business, 189; views of marriage, 190; attempts to become a deputy, 192, 196; his accident, 195; his political views, 197, 319; religious views, 200; proprietor of the Chronique de Paris, 202; friendship with Gautier, 204; contributions to the Revue des Deux Mondes, 207; agreement with Buloz, 208; disputes with the proprietors of the Revue de Paris, 209–15; attack on journalism, 216, 273; illness, 218, 254, 259, 285, 354; visits to Italy, 219, 229, 236, 285; relations with Madame Marbouty, 219; on the death of Madame de Berny, 220; imprisonment, 221; at Chaillot, 221; "La Vieille Fille," 222; on the failure of Werdet, 223; various compositions, 224; agreement with Bohain, 225; correspondence with "Louise," 226; his room in the Rue des Batailles, 227; starts the association of the "Cheval Rouge," 228; his villa "Les Jardies," 232, 237–41; at Nohant, 232; his journey to Sardinia, 234; at Milan, 236; his scheme for growing pine-apples, 241; projected plays, 242, 310; "L'École des Menages," 242, 245; his collaborator, 243; defence of Peytel, 246; mode of writing his play

"Vautrin," 249–51; the plot, 252; failure, 253; relations with Madame Visconti, 255, 259; attempt to start the Revue Parisienne, 256; President of the Société des Gens-de-Lettres, 257; withdrawal, 258; leaves Les Jardies, 258; on the death of M. de Hanski, 260; "Les Ressources de Quinola," 261–5; at St. Petersburg, 269; meeting with Madame Hanska, 269; love for her, 269; impressions of Germany, 272; his play "Paméla Giraud," 273; "Les Paysans," 277–9, 305–9; his travels with Madame Hanska, 283–5; at Naples, 285; dispute with Girardin, 287, 305–309; sufferings from neuralgia, 275, 288; at Rome, 291; presented to the Pope, 291; "La Cousine Bette," 293; "Le Cousin Pons," 293; his secret engagement, 295; his house in the Rue Fortunée, 298, 321–4; anguish at the theft of Madame Hanska's letters, 303; destroys them, 304; journey to Wierzchownia, 311; impressions of the palace, 312; attentions of the Russians, 313; effect of the climate on his health, 316; unnatural life, 316; undiminished vivacity, 318, 329; "La Marâtre," 325; "Mercadet" or "Le Faiseur," 326; his failing health, 329, 332, 345, 358, 367; candidature for the Académie Française, 330; return to Russia, 332; on the character of the Comtesse Georges Mniszech, 333; strained relations with his family, 335–9; his irritability, 336; his letters to Madame Surville, 340–342, 351; letters to old friends, 344; sufferings from aneurism of the heart, 347; attack of fever, 348; marriage, 356; his happiness, 357; journey to Dresden, 359; at Frankfort, 360; indifference of his wife, 362; arrival home, 364; interview with doctor, 370; his death, 371 funeral, 375; pall-bearers, his debts paid off, 377; pil of his house, 379; scatt manuscripts, 380; character 381–5; aim of his writings, realism, 383; pessimistic view life, 383; a poet and idealist, creative powers, 384.

Balzac, Madame Honoré, pays Balzac's debts, 377; extravag of her daughter, 378; her d 379

Balzac, Laure, 27; her marriage, see Surville

Balzac, Laurence, 27; her mar 28; death, 28.

Balzac, Madame de, her chara 27, 79; children, 27–30; treat of Honoré, 29; capacity for ness, 147; relations with Hon 148–50, 335–9; her illness, 343, 364; installed in the Fortunée, 331; present at death of her son, 374

Balzac, M. de, 24; a Royalist, his marriage, 25; at Tours, pamphlets, 26; character, 26, optimism, 26; death, 27, 92 charge of the Commissariat of First Division of the army, pecuniary losses, 52; disc of his birth register, 111

Barbier, partner with Balzac,

Baroche, M., at the funeral Balzac, 375

Bartolini, his bust of Mad Hanska, 230

Bartolommeo, Fra, his pictur the "Holy Family," 323

Bayeux, 73

"Béatrix," 277

Beauregard, Château de, 378; of, 379

Beauvoir, Roger de, 214

Beaux-Arts, Director of the, offer to Balzac, 254

Bechet, Madame Charles, the publisher, 166; transactions with Balzac, 166, 168; her marriage, 217
Bellizard and Dufour, MM., proprietors of the Revue Étrangère de St. Pétersbourg, 210
Belloy, Marquis de, 202, 210
Benzelin, M., 44
Berditchef, Church of Saint Barbe at, 356
Bergès, M., 193
Berlin, 271
Bernard, Charles de, 161, 164, 202
Berny, Madame de, her friendship with Balzac, 79, 80, 93, 134; character, 80; portrait, 82; children, 82; assistance to Balzac, 88; parting with him, 146; criticism of "Louis Lambert," 146; illness, 171; death, 220
Berry, Duchesse de, her captivity, 196; delight in Balzac's books, 196
Berthoud, M. Henri, manager of the Gazette de Cambrai, 193
Besançon, 161
Biré, M. Edmond, 111; "Honoré de Balzac," 310 note, 320 note, 324 note, 326 note, 330 note
Blaye, Castle of, 196
Blois, 284
Bohain, 177; contract with Balzac, 225
Bonnaire, 206, 210
Borel, Mdlle. Henriette, 142, 160, 301; her reception into the Convent de la Visitation, 275
Borget, Auguste, 96; his friendship with Balzac, 96, 344
Bougival, 310
Boulanger, his portrait of Balzac, 180-84, 187
Boulonnière, La, 171, 222
Bourges, 284
Bourget, Lac du, 151
Brindeau, Achille, 206
Brody, 314
Brugnolle, Madame de, 258, 292
Brune, Claire, 219
Brussels, 284
Buisson, 237, 249
Buloz, M., director of the Revue des Deux Mondes, 206; his relations with Balzac, 206-11; contract, 208; action against, 211; lawsuit, 212

Campenon, M. Vincent, 274
Canezac, Saint-Martin de, 111
Cannstadt, 283
"Carabbas, The Marquis of," 168
Caricature, 115
Carlsruhe, 283
Carraud, Madame, her friendship with Balzac, 94; character, 94; her views on marriage, 95; letters from Balzac, 344, 357
Carraud, M., director of the military school at Saint-Cyr, 94
Castries, Madame la Marquise de, 9, 122, 135; her appearance, 136; relations with Balzac, 137, 151-3; character, 138; rupture with Balzac, 153
"Centenaire, Le," 75
"César Birotteau," 8, 49, 87, 130, 133, 233
Chaillot, 221
Châlons, 284
Chambord, Madame and the Comte de, their exile, 196
Champfleury, "Balzac au Collège," 36 note; "Grandes Figures d'Hier et d'Aujourd'hui," 318 note; "Notes Historiques sur M. de Balzac," 319 note
Champrosay, 107
Chapelain, M., 185
Chateaubriand, M., 330
"Chaumière et le Château, La," 278
Chénier, André, 99
"Cheval Rouge," association, 228; members, 229
Chimay, Princesse de, 81
Chinon, 194
"Chouans, Les," 67, 90, 107
"Chronique de Paris," 12, 202

Cogniard, director of the Porte. Saint-Martin, 325
"Comédie Humaine," 19, 166, 369; preface to, 265; divisions, 266–8
Comte, Bois le, 114
Constitutional, letter in the, 320
"Contemporaine, L'Envers de l'Histoire," 277, 313
"Contes Drôlatiques," 8, 121, 141; partially burnt, 175; criticism of, 207
"Coqsigrue," 67
Corsica, 234
"Cousin Pons, Le," 8, 293, 322
"Cousine Bette, La," 8, 201, 293, 301
Cracow, 314
"Cromwell," 67; plot of the tragedy, 70; adverse criticisms on, 72
Cunmer, "Les Français peints par eux-mêmes," edited by, 53
Czarouski, Abbé Comte, performs the ceremony of Balzac's marriage, 356

Dablin, M. Théodore, 59, 97, 191, 344; friendship with Balzac, 97
Daffinger, his miniature of Madame Hanska, 145, 185
Decazes, M., 5
Delannoy, Madame, 98, 344
Dennery, M., 328
"Deputé d'Arcis, Le," 301, 377
"Dernière Fée, La," 75, 77, 174
"Deux Philosophes, Les," 67
Dickens, Charles, his portrayal of character, 385
Dorval, Madame, 5, 262, 325, 329
Dresden, 272, 283, 284, 359
"Droit d'Ainesse, Du," 78
"Duchesse de Langeais, 137, 170
Duckett, M. William, founds the Chronique de Paris, 202
Dujarier, M., manager of La Presse, 278; killed in a duel, 279
Dumas, M. Alexandre, 182, 214; "L'Alchémiste," 245; "La Reine Margot," 283, 308; at the funeral of Balzac, 375
Durand, Madame Veuve, 221
Dürer, Albert, his "Portrait of Woman," 323
Dutacq, M., 377

Écho de la Jeune France, 213
École des Menages, L'," 242
"Enfant Maudit, L'," 207
"Enquête sur la Politique des Ministères," 192
"Épisode sous la Terreur, Un," 1[illegible]
"Étrangère, L'," letters from, 1[illegible] et seqq.
"Études Analytiques," 167, 268
"Études de Mœurs au XIX[illegible] Siècle," 166, 224
"Études Philosophiques," 167, 2[illegible]
"Eugénie Grandet," 169
"Europe Littéraire, L'," 122, 213
"Expiation, L'," 140

"Facino Cane," 226
"Faiseur, Le," comedy, 326
"Fausse Maîtresse, La," 255
Fessart, M., 377
Feuillide, Capo de, manager of L'Europe Littéraire, 213
Figaro, 98; article in the, on Balzac's method of composition, 129–33
"Fille aux Yeux d'Or, La," 227
FitzJames, Duc de, 136, 153, 194
FitzJames, Laure Auguste de, 84
Flaubert, character of his books, [illegible]
Florence, 230
Fontainebleau, 284
Forbach, 303
Forfellier, manager of the Écho de la Jeune France, 213
Fortunée, Rue, Balzac's house in the, 298, 321; decorations and furniture, 299, 322; gallery, 32[illegible] pictures, 323; costs, 324; [illegible] persal, 379
Fougères, Château of, 90, 107, 1[illegible]
"Français, Les, peints par [illegible] mêmes," 53
France, Revolution of 1848, 317
"France et l'Étranger, La," 202
Franck, Dr., 332

Frankfort, 360
Frapesle, 94, 232
"Fraternité Universelle, Club de la," 320
Fronsac, Duc de, 81

Gatien, St., Cathedral of, 43
"Gaudissart II.," 276
Gautier, Théophile, "Portraits Contemporaines—Honoré de Balzac," 17 note, 24 note, 227 note, 241 note, 366 note, 368 note, 382 note; on the failure of "Paméla Giraud," 60; on the portrait of Balzac, 180; his friendship with him, 204; his sonnets, 205; member of the "Cheval Rouge" association, 229; on Balzac's projected play "Vautrin," 249–51; on Madame de Girardin, 310; his description of Balzac's house in the Rue Fortunée, 321; on his death, 368
Gay, Delphine, 101; see Girardin
Gay, Madame Sophie, 100; "Anatole," 100
Geneva, 154, 170, 219
Genoa, 229, 230
Gens-de-Lettres, Société des, 257; the code, 190, 257
Geoffroy, 328
Germany, impressions of, 272
Germeau, M., Prefect of Metz, 295
"Gertrude, tragédie bourgeoise," 325
Girardin, Émile de, editor of La Presse, 12, 102; his letters to Balzac, 114; editor of La Mode, 114; relations with Balzac, 168; dispute with him, 277, 287, 305–9; demand for payment, 329
Girardin, Madame de, 101; "La Canne de M. de Balzac," 19, 102; style of her conversation, 290; on the relations between Balzac and Madame Hanska, 296; her last note to Balzac, 306; on the news of his death, 309; her death, 309; character, 310
Giraud, his portrait of Balzac, 375
"Goncourts, Journal des," 379 note
Gosselin, the publisher, 139, 169
Got, 328
"Gouvernement Moderne, Du," 192 note
Gozlan, Léon, 214; on the versatility of Balzac, 4; on his reserve, 10; "Balzac en Pantoufles," 23 note, 244 note; member of the "Cheval Rouge" association, 229; "Balzac Chez Lui," 257 note
Gramont, Comte de, 202
Grand-Besançon, M., 193
Grandmain, M., 258
"Grenadière, La," 117, 220
Guidoboni-Visconti, Comte, 218
Guillonet-Merville, M. de, 48

Hague, La, 284
Hamelin, Madame, 369 note
Hanotaux and Vicaire, MM., "La Jeunesse de Balzac," 81 note, 146 note
Hanska, Countess Anna, 142; her engagement, 283; marriage, 295; see Mniszech Hanska, Madame, 2; letters from Balzac, 2, 5, 14; on "La Peau de Chagrin," 122; correspondence with Balzac, 139, 156; life in the château of Wierzchownia, 142; early life, 143; death of her children, 144; character, 144; intellect, 144; miniature, 145, 185; appearance, 145, 163; her relations with Balzac, 159, 165, 269, 279–82, 292, 315, 332, 339, 346; at Neufchâtel, 160; meeting with Balzac, 162; death of her husband, 260; feelings towards Balzac, 270, 279; vacillations, 279, 296, 345; at Dresden, 280; in Paris, 283, 301; at Wiesbaden, 294; her secret engagement, 295; theft of her letters, 303; lawsuits, 334; wishes to break off her engagement, 339, 346; ignorance of Balzac's illness, 348; characteristics, 349; maternal love, 350; character of her affection for Balzac, 350; at Kiev, 353; her marriage, 356; journey to Dresden, 359; at Frankfort, 360; her pearl necklace, 360; letter to her daughter, 361; want of feeling for her husband, 362, 363; pays off his debts, 377; death, 379

Hanski, M. Vencelas de, 142; his character, 143; liking for Balzac, 163; his death, 260
Harel, manager of the Théâtre Porte-St. Martin, 249
Hédouin, Edmond, 322
"Héritière de Birague, L'," 75, 76, 174
Hetzel, his advice to Balzac on writing a preface, 265
Hinner, Joseph, 81
Hinner, Louise Antoinette Laure, 81; see Berny
"Histoire des Treize, L'," 121
Historique, Théâtre, 310
Hobbema, his picture "A Landscape," 323
"Honorine," 278
Hostein, M., director of the Théâtre Historique, 310; "Historiettes et Souvenirs d'un Homme de Théâtre," 311 note, 382 note; accepts the comedy "Le Faiseur," 327
Houssaye, Arsène, on Balzac's interview with his doctor, 370 note
Hugo, Victor, 274; "Choses Vues," 27 note, 368 note, 369 note, 371 note; "Ruy Blas," 244; his visits to Balzac, 368, 369; on his death, 371–4; at his funeral, 375

"Illusions Perdues," 87, 194, 216, 217, 233
Indre, the, 98
"Initié, L'," 313; sale of, 317
Italy, proposed visit to, 154; visits to, 218, 229, 236

Jacquillard, Madame, 217
"Jane la Pâle," 174
Janin, Jules, 214
"Jardies, Les," 232; characteristics of, 237–41; imaginary decorations, 238; the garden, 238; wall, 240; fictitious sale, 259
Jargayes, Chevalier de, 81
"Jean-Louis," 75, 76, 174
"Jesuites, Histoire impartiale des," 78
Jitomir, Bishop of, 356

Kiev, 313, 345; "Foire des Contrats" at, 353
Kisselef, Countess, 369 note
Knothe, Dr., his treatment of Balzac's case, 347

Laborde, Madame Quelpée de, 81
Lacressonière, Madame, 325
Lamartine, 319; on Balzac's eyes, 17; on his appearance, 18
Lamennais, M. de, "Paroles d'un Croyant," 257
Languedoc, 24
Laurent, M., 88
Laurent-Jan, 327
Laurentie, M., 194
Lassailly, 243
Lausanne, 219
Lemaître, Frederick, 252, 327; at "Les Jardies," 239
Lemer, Julien, "Balzac, sa Vie, son Œuvre," 316 note, 318 note
Lepitre, M., tutor to Balzac, 44
"Lettres à l'Étrangère," 14, 157
Levavasseur, M., 114
Lireux, director of the Odéon, 262
Livonia, 271
"Livre Mystique, Le," 212
Lockroy, M., manager of the Théâtre Français, 326
Locquin, the publisher, 278
Loève-Veimars, M., 214
Loir river, 37
Loire canal scheme, 221
Louis XVI., 81
Louis XVII., 81
"Louis Lambert," 37, 50, 98, 146

Louise," her correspondence with Balzac, 226
owell, Frances Sarah, 218
ons, 284
Lys dans la Vallée, Le," 98, 210; substituted for the "Mémoires d'une Jeune Mariée," 210; preface, 214; sale, 223

Maison du Chat-qui-pelote, La," 87, 87
Maison de Nucingen, La," 233 Maître Cornélius, Le," 118 me, the publisher, 168
arâtre, La," 325
rbouty, Madame, her relations with Balzac, 218-20; resemblance to George Sand, 219; "Une Fausse Position," 220 Marcas, Z.," 255
rgonne, Madame de, 98
rgonne, M. de, 98, 107, 118, 217
rie Antoinette, 81
rseilles, 233, 284
Massimilla Doni," 233
Médecin de Campagne, Le," 154, 169, 199
lingue, 325
Mémoires d'une Jeune Mariée," 210, 211, 215
Mémoires de deux Jeunes Mariées, Les," 255 Ménage de Garçon, Un," 255
Mercadet," comedy, 326
Mercadet le Faiseur," 328, 377; production of, 328
rville, M. Guillonet de, 82
ry, 214, 285
Message, Le," 207
esse de l'Athée, La," 97
ihaud, De, "Biographie Universelle," 45 note an, 229, 236
iszech, Comte Georges, 312; his gagement, 276, 283; collection f insects, 294; marriage, 295; a vitness of Balzac's marriage, 356; is delicate state of health, 378
iszech, Comtesse Georges, Balzac on her character, 333; appearance, 334; visit to Kiev, 353; attack of measles, 359; extravagances, 378; creditors, 379 Mode, La, 114
"Modeste Mignon," 276
Molleville, Bertrand de, 25
"Monographie de la Presse Parisienne," 216, 273
Mont Cénis, 236
Montalembert, Comte de, 123
Montriveau, Armand de, his character and appearance, 138
Montrouge, plain of, 237
Montzaigle, M. Saint-Pierre de, 28; refuses to support his children, 221
Moscow, 345
Munch, François, his preparations for Balzac's return, 364; attack of madness, 365
Munich, 173

Nacquart, Dr., 75, 128, 172
Naples, 285
Napoleon I., Emperor, his last review on the Carrousel, 46
Nemours, 118
Neufchâtel, 160
Noailles, Duc de, 194, 331
Nodier, Charles, 177, 274
Nohant, 232
Nord, Chemin de Fer du, shares in the, 287, 306
Norton, Mrs., 306
Nougarie, La, 111

Odéon theatre, 261
Olizar, Comte Gustave, 356
Orléans, 284
Ourliac, Edouard, on Balzac's method of composition, 129-33

"Paméla Giraud," 53, 273; failure of, 60
"Parents Pauvres, Les," 293, 316, 366
Paris, letters on, 115
Passez, M., 48

Passy, 258, 283, 285
"Paysans, Les," 199, 275, 277–9, 377
"Peau de Chagrin," 50, 62, 66, 93, 118, 122–5; its cynical tone, 122
Pélissier, Mdlle. Olympe, 124, 177
"Père Goriot, Le," 8, 172
Père la Chaise cemetery, 376
Perémé, M. Armand, 96, 244
Périollas, M., 96, 344
"Perle Brisée," 224
Petigny, M. de, 65; on Balzac's mode of writing, 68
"Petites Misères de la Vie Conjugale," 275
"Petits Bourgeois, Les," 326, 377
Peytel, condemned to death, 246; execution, 247
Philippon, M., editor of the Caricature, 115
"Physiologie du Mariage," 107, 122
Pichot, Amedée, 116, 213; disputes with Balzac, 118–21, 168; retires from the management of the Revue de Paris, 206
Pierre et Cathérine," historical drama, 310
"Pierre Grassou," 255
Pineapples, scheme for growing, 241
Piombo, Sebastian del, his picture "Chevalier de Malte en Prière," 323
Planche, Gustave, 202; his criticism of the "Contes drôlatiques," 207 Pohrbyszcze, Château of, 143
Poitevin, M. Le, 76, 174
Pommereul, General Baron de, 107, 192
Pongerville, M. de, 274
Portal, M. Charles, 111
Pot-de-Fer, Rue du, outbreak of fire in the printing office in the, 175
Prat, Lamartine de, "Balzac et ses Œuvres," 199 note
"Première Demoiselle, La," 233, 242
Presse, La, 102
"Prince de la Bohême, Un," 255
Quotidienne, 154, 195, 216

Rabou, Charles, editor of the Revue de Paris, 103, 116, 207, 377
"Rabouilleuse, La," 278
Railway du Nord speculation, 287, 306
Ratier, Victor, editor of the Silhouette, 115
"Recherche de l'Absolu, La," 125, 172
Regnault, M. Émile, 174, 202, 210
Renaissance Theatre, 244
"Rendez-vous, Le," 207
Rénovateur, The, 194
"Ressources de Quinola, Les," 4, 261–5
Revue des Deux Mondes, 206
Revue Étrangère de St. Pétersbourg, 210, 214
Revue de Paris, 107, 116, 206; lawsuit against M. de Balzac, 107–9, 211
Revue Parisienne, the first number, 256
"Richard, Cœur d'Éponge," 290
"Richard Savage," proposed play, 326
Rodin, M., his statue of Balzac, 185
"Roi des Mendiants, Le," 329
Rolle, Hippolyte, 326
Rome, visit to, 291
Roqueplan, Nestor, director of the Théâtre des Variétés, 290
Rossini, 177
Rotterdam, 284
Rouy, M., 305, 309
Rzewuska, Countess Eve, 143; see Hanska
Rzewuski, Count Henry, 143

Saché, 98, 107, 118, 146, 195, 222, 231
Saint-Cyr, military school at, 94
Sainte-Beuve at the funeral of Balzac, 375
Saint-Firmin, 80
Saint-Joseph, M. Anthoine de, 206
St. Petersburg, 269
Saint-Priest, M. de, elected a member of the Académie Française, 331

"Comédie Humaine," 19; her friendship with Balzac, 104; rupture with Jules Sandeau, 105, 125; her appearance, 105.
Sandeau, Jules, 24, 99, 117, 202, 210; his rupture with George Sand, 105, 125; "Marianna," 105; on Balzac's mode of working, 113; his relations with him, 125; member of the "Cheval Rouge" association, 229
Sardinia, impressions of, 235; mining scheme, 230
"Savant, Le," 77
"Scènes de la Vie Privée," 108, 122, 140, 166, 266; "Province," 166, 266; "Parisienne," 166, 267; "Militaire," 267; "Politique," 267; "Campagne," 267.
Sclopis, Comte, 219
Scott, Sir Walter, Balzac's admiration for, 384
Scribe, Eugène, 48
"Secret des Ruggieri, Le," 224
Sédillot, M., 88
"Séraphita," 8, 206, 209, 212
Sèvres, "Les Jardies," 232
Sganzer, M., 44
Silhouette, 115
Soulié, Frédéric, 214
Spectateur Républicain, Le, 317
Spoelberch de Lovenjoul, Vicomte de, "La Genèse d'un Roman de Balzac," 12 note, 114 note, 277, 283 note, 287 note, 301 note, 305 note, 306 note, 307 note, 317 note, 330 note, 376 note; "Une Page Perdue de Honoré de Balzac," 76 note, 119 note, 174 note, 295 note, 343 note, 364 note; his collection of letters, 95 note; "Autour de Honoré de Balzac," 96 note, 121 note, 180 note, 205 note, 219 note, 244 note, 266 note; "Un Roman sanes," 277
"Stella," 67
Strasburg, 283
Sue, Eugène, 214
Surville, Madame de, "Balzac, sa Vie et ses Œuvres, d'après la Correspondance," 21 note, 34 note, 43 note, 61 note, 170 note, 248 note; "Le Compagnon du Foyer," 31; affection for her brother Honoré, 31, 34; her marriage, 32, 73; illness, 174; letter from Honoré on his proposed marriage, 340–42
Surville, M. Midy de la Grenerave, his marriage, 32, 73; jealousy of Balzac, 33; money troubles, 33; Loire canal scheme, 221
Surville, Sophie, 332
Surville, Valentine, 332

"Ténébreuse Affaire, Une," 48, 49, 255
Touche, La, editor of the Figaro, 98; friendship with Balzac, 99; his pupils, 99; character, 99.
Touraine, character of the scenery, 42
Tours, 25, 284; cathedral, 43
Turin, 218

Ukraine, 142
"Ursule Mirouët," 255

Vacquerie, M., 330
Varaigne, Victor, 114
Vatout, M., 330
"Vautrin, La Dernière Incarnation de," 249–51, 301, 306; plot, 252; performance, 252; failure, 253; produced at the Gaîté, 325
"Vieille Fille, La," 222, 224
Vendôme, semi-military college at, 36
Venice, 230

Véron, Dr., 116
Vevey, 219
"Vicaire des Ardennes, Le," 75, 77
"Vie de Femme, Une," 46
Vienna, 173
Villefranche, 196
Villeparisis, 54
Visconti, Madame, 218; her relations with Balzac, 255, 259
Visitation, Couvent de la, 275
Voleur, 115
"Voyage de Paris à Java," 121
"Wann Chlore," 75
Wedmore, Frederick, "Life of Balzac," 379 note
Werdet, his failure, 12, 223; on Balzac's mode of life," 127; on his personal charm, 188
Wierzchownia, 141, 311
Wiesbaden, 294
Wylezynska, Mdlles. Denise and Séverine, 142

Zola, Émile, his view of the character of man, 383

Printed by Hazell, Watson & Viney, Ld., London and Aylesbury

MR. MURRAY'S LIST

THE VICEROY'S POST-BAG. By MICHAEL MACDONAGH, Author of "Daniel O'Connell, the Irish Tribune." Demy 8vo, 12*s.* net.

The letters on which this book is based are from the post-bag of the Earl of Hardvicke, the first Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland after the Union. They baffled the keen earch of the late Mr. Lecky in the secret archives of Dublin Castle, and were therefore supposed by him to have been destroyed, as he states in his "History of Ireland n the Eighteenth Century." Lord Hardwicke was most methodical and businesslike n his habits. He not only kept a copy of every letter, official and private, he wrote luring his term of office to Ministers in London, but retained the replies in his ersonal possession, and carried them off on his leaving Ireland in 1806. Three ears ago they were sold to the trustees of the British Museum, and have since been rranged, classified and made accessible. The correspondence dealing with the Emmet Insurrection in 1803 has been supplemented (by courteous permission of the Right Hon. A. Akers-Douglas) by extracts from secret papers in the Home Office, ow also made public for the first time.

THE HOUSE OF QUIET: AN AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By J. T. Demy 8vo. 8*s.* net.

"These sketches are done with a delicate sympathy, with observation, and with n amused, quiet humour which has great charm . . . they are attractive, sweet, and uman; we should call them clever if they were not something much better than lever."—Athenæum.

LUCRETIA BORGIA. By FERDINAND GREGOROVIUS. Translated by JOHN LESLIE GARNER. With Illustrations. Large crown 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.* net.

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE, HIS FAMILY AND FRIENDS. By the late CHARLES I. ELTON, M.P. Edited by A. HAMILTON THOMPSON. With a Memoir of the Author by ANDREW LANG. Demy 8vo. 15*s.* net.

"We know of no book save only Madden's 'Diary of Master William Silence' hich illustrates the works of Shakespeare with equal charm and ingenuity."—Spectator.

THE FRENCH NOBLESSE OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. Translated by Mrs. COLQUHOUN GRANT from "Les Souvenirs de la Marquise de Créquy" published in 1834. Demy 8vo. 12*s.* net.

"Mme. de Créquy is alive and vigorous, and we are much mistaken if, in the new English dress, she does not make thousands of friends."—The Times.

RUSKIN IN OXFORD, AND OTHER STUDIES. By the Very Rev. G. W. KITCHIN, D.D., Dean of Durham. With Illustrations. Square demy 8vo. 12*s.* net.

"An interesting and scholarly volume."—Daily Telegraph.

MODERN POETS OF FAITH, DOUBT AND PAGANISM, AND OTHER ESSAYS. By the Hon. ARTHUR TEMPLE LYTTELTON. With a Memoir of the Author by the LORD BISHOP OF ROCHESTER. Portrait. Demy 8vo. 9*s.* net.

"Running through all the papers there is a high-mindedness and a nobility of im and temper which are qualities too rare and valuable not to welcome and to herish."—The Times.

MAN AND HIS ENVIRONMENT: SOME THOUGHTS OF A THINKER. Collected and Edited by his Friend the Rev. JOHN P. KINGSLAND. Crown 8vo. 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

"There are many sound ideas and suggestive passages in the book, which is pervaded by spiritual warmth and intellectual candour—two things not always found ogether."—Literary World.

COMPLETION OF THE NEW EDITION OF THE WORKS OF LORD BYRON. A New Text, Collated with the Original MSS. and Revised Proofs, which are still in existence, with many hitherto Unpublished Additions. Edited by ERNEST H. COLERIDGE and ROWLAND E. PROTHERO, M.V.O. With Bibliographies and full Indices. With Portraits and Illustrations. 13 Vols. (6 Vols. Letters, 7 Vols. Poetry). Crown 8vo. 6*s.* each.

"It is our pleasure as well as our duty to record that Mr. Prothero's six goodly volumes form an edition of Byron's prose writings which adds enormously to our intimate knowledge of one of the most remarkable figures in the literature of the past century, and that the editor's work has been performed with skill and judgment."—Athenæum.

"Editor and publisher alike may be proud of the edition which is now complete. Jaded reviewers have welcomed each successive volume. . . . The more we see of Byron's letters, the greater is our astonishment, not only at his originality, but at the breadth of his literary knowledge . . their brilliancy is conspicuous, and they range over a very wide field of human emotion."—Morning Post.

A NEW LIBRARY EDITION OF THE HISTORICAL WORKS OF JOHN LOTHROP MOTLEY. With Photogravure Illustrations. In 9 Volumes. Demy 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.* net each.

HISTORY OF THE RISE OF THE DUTCH REPUBLIC. 3 Vols.

HISTORY OF THE UNITED NETHERLANDS. 4 Vols.

JOHN OF BARNEVELD. 2 Vols.

No uniform edition of Motley's Historical Works has ever existed in England, and for many years past the original Library Editions of the earlier works have been completely out of print.

THE JOURNAL OF MONTAIGNE'S TRAVELS IN ITALY, BY WAY OF SWITZERLAND AND GERMANY, IN 1580 AND 1581. Translated and Edited with an Introduction and Notes by W. G. WATERS, Author of "Jerome Cardan," etc. With Portraits and other Illustrations. 3 Vols. Pott 8vo. 15*s.* net; also in Vellum, 21*s.* net.

BETWEEN THE ACTS. By HENRY W. NEVINSON, Author of "The Plea of Pan." Square Demy 8vo. 9*s.* net.

"You will be more than charmed, even fascinated, by the scenes and sketches in Mr. Nevinson's 'Between the Acts.'"—Truth.

THE OLD STORIES OF IRELAND.

THREE WORKS TREATING OF GAELIC LEGENDS.

EDITED AND TRANSLATED BY LADY GREGORY.

GODS AND FIGHTING MEN. The Story of the Tuatha de Danaan and of the Fianna of Ireland. With a Preface by W. B. YEATS. Large Crown 8vo. 6*s.* net.

"To say that Lady Gregory's new collection of Irish legends is worthy of her 'Cuchulain of Muirthemne' is praise enough."—Daily Chronicle.

CUCHULAIN OF MUIRTHEMNE. The Story of the Men of the Red Branch of Ulster. Large Crown 8vo. 6*s.* net.

"It is the best book that has come from Ireland in recent years."—The Times.

"Lady Gregory's altogether charming 'Cuchulain of Muirthemne.'"—Pall Mall Gazette.

POETS AND DREAMERS. Studies and Translations from the Irish. Crown 8vo. 6*s.*

". . . her book is one to which all lovers of Ireland and Irish literature will turn with keen enjoyment, and that more than once."—The Times.

ON THE OLD ROAD THROUGH FRANCE TO FLORENCE. Reproductions in Colour of 48 Water-colour Sketches. By A. H. HALLAM MURRAY, accompanied by H. W. NEVINSON and MONTGOMERY CARMICHAEL. Medium 8vo. 21*s.* net. Also an Edition of 150 Copies on Large Paper, 42*s.* net.

OLD TIME TRAVEL. Personal Reminiscences of the Continent Forty Years Ago Compared with Experiences of the Present Day. By ALEXANDER INNES SHAND. With numerous Illustrations by A. H. HALLAM MURRAY. Square Demy 8vo. 12*s.* net.

"A work of travel almost unique of its kind."—Yorkshire Post.

ADRIA: A TALE OF VENICE. By the Hon. ALEXANDER NELSON HOOD. With Illustrations. Crown 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.* net.

"Mr. Hood's narrative, with its fine leisurely prose and frequent Johnsonian cadences, its dignified movement, and we may add, in lack of an English word, its naïveté, which is almost worthy of Goldsmith, leaves a comforting 18th-century flavour of solidity and repose."—The Times.

IMPRESSIONS OF JAPAN. By G. H. RITTNER. Illustrated. Square Demy 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.* net.

"Mr. Rittner has evidently made a close study of many interesting aspects of Japanese life . . . he is gifted with a very clear and simple descriptive style; his graphic accounts of the people, their customs and their modes of life may be read with great advantage."—The World.

AN INDIAN GARDEN. By Mrs. HENRY COOPER EGGAR. With Coloured Frontispiece and 18 Illustrations. Square Demy 8vo. 7*s.* 6*d.* net.

WILD LIFE AT THE LAND'S END. Records and Observations of the Habits and Haunts of the Fox, Badger, Otter, Seal, etc., and of their Pursuers in Cornwall. By J. C. TREGARTHEN. With Illustrations. Square Demy 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.* net.

"Mr. Tregarthen not only knows what he is writing about, but he knows how to write. The result is a singularly charming volume, which will be read with delight not only by lovers of one of the most fascinating of English counties, but by all who follow the chase of the otter, the badger, and the fox."—County Gentleman.

IANTO THE FISHERMAN, AND OTHER SKETCHES OF COUNTRY LIFE. By ALFRED W. REES. With Illustrations. Large Crown 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.* net.

JOURNEY TO LHASA AND CENTRAL TIBET. A New Edition. By SARAT CHANDRA DAS, C.I.E., of the Bengal Educational Service, Member of the Asiatic Society, Bengal, etc. With Map and Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 10*s.* 6*d.* net.

". . . most complete and authoritative account not only of the sacred city of Lhasa, but of Central Tibet and its people."—The Daily Chronicle.

THE HEART OF A CONTINENT. A Narrative of Travels in Manchuria, across the Gobi Desert, through the Himalayas, the Pamirs, and Hunza, 1884–1894. By Col. FRANCIS EDWARD YOUNGHUSBAND, C.I.E. A Cheap Revised Fourth Edition. With Portrait of Author, a Map, and other Illustrations. Demy 8vo. 6*s.* net.

THREE VOLUMES OF POEMS. By BLISS CARMAN. Crown 8vo. 2*s.* 6*d.* net each.

SONGS OF THE SEA CHILDREN.

THE PIPES OF PAN. From the Book of Myths.

FROM THE GREEN BOOK OF THE BARDS.

"Mr. Carman's verses attain a notable gracefulness, both in thought and expression. The note of joy runs in them all like a fine sap. . . . The entire work is a treasure and a delight."—To-Day.

THE KINSHIP OF NATURE. By BLISS CARMAN, Author of "The Pipes of Pan," "The Green Book of the Bards." Crown 8vo. 6*s.*

"It is long since we came across a new book with so much at once of invigoration and charm."—Glasgow Herald.

THE LATEST SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

IN THE STRAITS OF HOPE. By ELEANOR CROPPER, Author of "The Delusion of Diana."

SABRINA WARHAM. By LAURENCE HOUSMAN. Author of "A Modern Antæus," "An Englishwoman's Love Letters," etc.

"The book has much that is true and beautiful."—Morning Post.
"Sabrina is delightful. . . . Mr. Housman's work comes for pure refreshment."—Church Times.

THE ROSE SPINNER. By MARY DEANE, Author of "Treasure and Heart."

"An exceptionally well-written story."—Outlook.

THE GREATNESS OF JOSIAH PORLICK. By ANON.

"This is a fine book."—The Times.
"Drawn with admirable force. The end is fine; its satire is acutely just."—The World.

BROTHERS. By HORACE A. VACHELL, Author of "The Pinch of Prosperity," "The Shadowy Third," "John Charity," etc.

"All the characters have individuality, and are instinct with life and with human nature. It is a book to love and to live in awhile, and a book which will not lightly be forgotten."—Westminster Gazette.

THE VEIL OF THE TEMPLE. By W. H. MALLOCK, Author of "The New Republic," "A Human Document," etc.

". . . We have rarely seen the connexion between civilisation and the postulates of religion more convincingly or incisively emphasized."—Athenæum.

FORT AMITY. By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH.

"This is the best novel Mr. Quiller-Couch has yet written. It has afforded us the keenest enjoyment. . . . A novel of remarkable force and picturesqueness."—Ladies' Field.

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.